Upon what thinkest thou, Hesiod? dost thou not fear that the gods will call thee to an account for the wit which they have given thee? what hast thou done with it since thou camest into the world? art thou not ashamed to dwell in the hill of Helicon, to be neighbor to the Mountain from whence we took our birth, to be so near Parnassus, and to sleep on the brink of Hippocrene, without ever having had a thought of composing Verses? Thinkest thou that the gods have given thee wit, memory, fancy, and judgement, to employ upon nothing? Awaken thy self from this drowsiness, wherein sloth still detains thee, consider that the life of men is too short, for them to be contented with it, and that there is nothing so sweet as for a man to acquire immortality to himself. Consider what glory it is that attends thee, if thou believest the counsels which we give thee; and to encourage thee to follow them, know, that if thou wilt, thy name shall be celebrated throughout all Ages, and amongst all Nations, and thou shalt be universally acknowledged for the Father of all the Poets, which shall arise in the whole extent of the world. Do not imagine that what we tell thee is a small matter, for I can assure thee (upon the word of Apollo, who knows things to come) that they who are descended, or who shall descend in the sequel of time, from the greatest Kings, or the most illustrious Heroes, shall not be owner of so great a fame, as they who shall follow thee. But to give thee a light Idea of it, redouble thy attention; follow me to the top of my Helicon, take good notice of all that I shall shew thee there, hearken with respect to the great things which I am going to inform thee of, and believe all that I shall tell thee cannot miss coming to pass; for the most secret books of destiny are always open to Apollo, from whom it is I speak to thee.

After this, Hesiod thought that he was transported to the top of Mount Helicon, from whence discovering all Greece, as he thought, he beheld the fairest object that ever he had seen. But though he conceiv'd himself elevated very high, yet he perceiv'd the most remote objects, as distinctly as if they had been very near; for when we see things only in imagination, we see them as well afar off as near. In this place under a great Laurel which made a handsome umbrage, Calliope all alone appear'd to him again, and addressing to him with a majestic air, and full of sweetness and charms;

Rowze up thy mind, Hesiod, said she to him, receive respectfully the favour Apollo does thee, of rendering thee capable to penetrate into futurity, and to enjoy true glory, which is never found till after death, and consequently is not very considerable during life. But to cause thee to enjoy it amply, it is requisite that I make thee a description of Poetry, that I recall what's past, and reaching forth unto that which is to come, make thee know, what none other shall know during thy generation; but as they who intending to shew a great River to a stranger, would not go to take view of it near its Spring, because it would seem too little; so likewise in going to shew thee the progress of Poetry, I must not trace it back to its original: because being it is really the off-spring of Heaven, I cannot conduct thee to the place of its nativity. It suffices to tell thee, that 'tis the language of the gods, and that Love and Glory have brought it into use amongst men; That without it the Heroes would dye unrewarded, that their names would perish soon after them; that Lovers would sigh without pleasure, that the art for one to render her himself immortal, by immortalizing others, would be unknown in the World. In the next place, look upon all Greece, as the first place wherein Poetry began to be celebrated, and from whence it shall pass successively to the other parts of the World. Dost thou not see a Woman of a goodly aspect, at the gate of the Temple of Delphos? 'tis Pheonous, the first Prophetess of that Temple; who invented the handsomest form of Verses; For by a privilege granted to Women, it may be affirmed that they have more share in poetry than men, since if they do not make Verses themselves, yet at least they inspire others with the desire of making them. Dost thou not see near her, that young man that plays upon the Harp? 'tis the famous Amphion, who added three strings to that instrument, to make them up seven, there having been but four before. It is also reported, that the stones, drawn by his harmony, ranked themselves one upon another, to build the Walls of Thebes: but the truth is, he became of such reputation among the Thebans, that he easily persuaded them to inclose their City. Look a little towards the right hand, and thou wilt see a venerable man: 'tis the most ancient of three Poets, who bear or will bear the name Linus, and the first whom Apollo taught the measures and numbers of Verse. He writ a Poem concerning the World, which got him such honor, that some have not stuck to call him the Son of Apollo; and indeed his name will be always celebrated by the Greek Poets, who will make Hymns upon his death, and particularly by the famous Sappho of Mytilene, whom I shall by and by shew you.

In the mean time, look upon him who appears so handsome, and so sad; 'tis Orpheus, from whom thou art descended, who was able to charm Hell, and recover Euridice from the shades of death, by the power of this melodie, and who not being able to contain one moment from looking upon that beloved person, lost her again for ever. This excellent Poet has composed thirty nine Poems, but time shall bereave posterity of them, excepting one Book of Hymns to the gods, and a Treatise of precious Stones, of which some fragments shall remain preserv'd from age to age and it shall be known in general, that he lov'd to treat of grave Subjects, as of the World, the Stars, and Morality.

He

He that thou seest behind him is Museus, to whom Orpheus address'd several of his Works, and left his Harp at his death; 'tis he that made the handsome Poem of Leander and Hero; although in process of time, some will go about to ascribe it to another Museus.

Then take notice of Melesigenes, who is thy kinsman, and whom thou must overcome at Chalcis. I shall say nothing to thee of his lineage, and the place where he was born; for thou knowest it well; but I shall assure thee, that he shall be so famous, that in future ages, seven Cities shall contend for the honor of having him their Native; namely Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, and Athens. He shall be indigent of the goods of Fortune, but rich in the gifts of the mind. He shall make several voyages, and shall be almost continually unhappy. He shall lay aside the name of Melesigenes, and take upon him that of Homer, because he shall become blind. After this accident, he shall become so poor, that he shall be constrain'd for a long time to beg alms. Yet he shall find charitable friends to assist him, and the gods themselves shall do a miracle for his sake; for the Seamen refusing to take him into their Vessel to go to Chios, shall be overtaken with so great a storm, that, imagining it befallen them, because they refus'd Homer, they shall return to the shore to take him in, and afterwards make a happy voyage. But at length Homer shall become a little more happy; he shall marry, and have two Daughters, and then it shall be, that he shall compose one Work, which he shall intitle Odysseus, and another, Ilias. The latter of which shall be more admir'd than the former, in the first ages which shall follow him; but in after-times, they shall be judg'd of quite contrary: but in truth, they shall both be worthy of the highest applauses. Homer in acknowledgement to those, by whom he shall be assisted, shall introduce them in his Works, to the end to immortalize their Virtue. For Phenicius his Father-in-law, and his first Master, shall find a place in the Odysseus; Mentor shall be highly celebrated there; he shall also speak advantageously of Mentes, and shall not forget a plain Mechanick, who shall entertain him for sometime at his house; and thus he shall give an heroicall testimony of acknowledgement, in an age that shall be ungrateful to his Virtue. But posterity shall at least render justice to his merit, and acknowledge him to have been Master of a grand and prodigious genius, with a natural, facile, and delightful style. He it is, that shall invent to begin a History in the middle, to the end, to suspend the minds of the Readers, and give them a kind of pleasing inquietude; it shall be he that shall introduce that admirable diversity of styles, in which he shall never be surpass'd by any; he shall be admir'd by the most eminent wits of Greece, and acknowledg'd in all ages for a Poet, worthy to be imitated in every respect by all others.

Judge then what glory will befall to you, in overcoming a man, whose name shall be famous, as long as Reason shall be amongst men.

Hitherto I have told you of the past and the present; I must begin with the amorous Mimnermus, to discover the future to you. Do not you perceive by his air and his aspect, that he will be able to sing of nothing but Love? 'Tis he that shall invent the way of the bewailing Elegie for the fair

Nanno his Mistress, who, by the sweetness of her voice, shall inspire him with the sweetness of his Verse: Nevertheless, the Works of this excellent man shall perish, and not live among those of others; but yet there shall be enough to judge, that he must needs have been a most delicate and amorous wit.

After this, Hesiod believ'd he saw only all Peloponnesus, the Sea that encompasses it, and particularly the Cape of Tenarus, and upon that Sea, not far from the Cape, a comely person carried upon the back of a Dolphin, playing upon an Harp, and looking sometimes towards the shore, and sometimes towards Heaven, as if he thanked the gods for some favor. After which, Calliope beginning again to speak, He that thou seest, said she, is the famous Arion; who shall invent the manner of Tragick Verses, and the introducing of a Chorus; he shall be ready to be slain by the mariners of a ship, out of intent to possess his Money; but having obtain'd permission to sing some Verses to his Harp, he shall do it so well, that the melody of his Song shall draw several Dolphins about the ship; upon which, Arion abandoning himself to them, shall leap into the Sea, and be receiv'd by one of those Dolphins, who shall carry him to the shore; and thus he shall find more humanity amongst Fishes, than amongst Men.

Then all these objects passing away, Hesiod beheld an Island, and upon the top of a Rock, a brown Woman of indifferent stature and beauty; yet she had quick and sprightly eyes, and was of a very comely shape: she that thou seest, said Calliope then to Hesiod, is the famous Sappho of Mytilene, who shall be celebrated throughout all ages, for the handsomness of her Verses, especially for a certain passionate and amorous style, which shall be almost inimitable. She shall invent the use of the Bow belonging to the Harp, which shall highly advantage the sound of it; she shall love a disloyal person, which shall be the cause of her death; but though almost all her works shall perish, yet her name shall live eternally; she shall be styled the tenth Muse, and in all Ages new Honors shall be ascrib'd to her.

But there is enough spoken, concerning this Illustrious Lesbian; therefore behold Alcans, who shall live at the same time; do not you see he has the aspect of a man of quality? his birth shall be very noble; he shall command the Armies of Mytilene, with his Brother Antimenides: but one of the seven Sages of Greece named Pittacus, shall possess himself of the Tyranny, and eject them; so that Alcans, an excellent Lyrick Poet, being incensed in mind, shall begin to write against him, and in general, against Tyranny and Tyrants, and make Verses, which shall be accounted seditious. His works shall be grave, and strong; he shall sometimes descend to Mirth and Love, and succeed very well therein, although more excellent for other things. He shall have so passionate a soul, that he shall desire to immortalize a little mark the person he shall love, shall have upon her foot; but he shall have the unhappiness to fall into the hands of Pittacus, who contenting himself with the power to be reveng'd, shall send him back again without harm, and by that handsome action, confirm to himself the prerogative of bearing the glorious title of Wife.

After this, Hesiod beheld Alceus no more; but saw a man disguis'd with a vizard in a Chariot, who went to and fro in the middle of a spacious place in Athens, encompass'd with the people. He that thou seest, said Calliope, is Theſſis, who shall himself act the Tragedies which he shall compose, and shall be famous for this sort of Works.

But then, Dost not thou see a man, who has a countenance sufficiently cheerful? 'tis Epicarmus, who shall be born in Sicily, and be the first inventor of Comedies, which shall perish by time, after having serv'd for a pattern to those that shall follow.

In the next place, behold two Poets with grave looks, marching together; one of them is Theognis, who rejecting Poetical fictions, shall write Precepts of Morality in Verse. Yet he shall sometimes intermingle Love in his Works, and that with some freedom. The other is Phocylides of Miletum, something more serious, who shall write of moral matters full of instruction, and draw the greatest part of his Sentences from the Books of certain Women who shall be called Sybyls, he shall be imitated one day by a French Poet, whose Verses shall for a long time be the first Lessons of Virtue for the young children of his own Nation. They shall both begin their Works in recommending the worshiping of the Divine Power, the honour of Parents, and judging with Justice, and fear of another Judgement, which attends both the good and the wicked. Then behold a man of a very comely person, but blind! 'tis Stesichorus of Sicily, a Lyrick Poet, who shall come near to the grandeur of Homer. 'Tis true, he shall be condemn'd for being too abundant; but there shall remain nothing of him besides his reputation. While he shall be yet in the cradle, a Nightingale shall sit and sing upon his mouth; he shall lose his sight for having spoken ill of Helene, but recover it again by making a Work in her praise, which he shall call a Palinode or Recantation. But after having shewn thee Stesichorus alone, I must also shew thee him in company; dost not thou see eight Men and a Woman? they are the nine Lyrick Poets, who shall be put together in resemblance of the nine Muses. The first without comparison, shall be Pindar, of whom I shall tell thee afterwards: and thou mayst see the rest about her, who are Simonides, Stesichorus, Ibycus, Alcman, Bacchylides, Anacreon, Alceus, and Sappho, who shall likewise be call'd the tenth Muse, as I told thee before.

But to speak at present only of Pindar, when he shall be in the cradle, the Bees shall make Honey upon his mouth. Dost thou not see that he is separated from the rest that environ him, and that he has none near him but a fair Virgin, with a Crown upon her head? 'tis Corinna, who shall have the glory of surpassing him five times publicly, and gain the prize for making better Verses than he. Nevertheless, he shall be a Poet of the first Order, in the judgement of the greatest Poets, that shall follow him. He shall be so sublime, that it shall be hard to follow him; his style shall be lofty, pure, and chaste, and truly worthy to entertain Kings and Princes. He shall love chiefly to sing the praises of those who shall have been Victors in the Olympick Games; However, as I mention'd before, Corinna shall overcome him five times: Some shall say, the reason shall be, for that being very handsome, her Verses shall thereby seem so much the more amiable; others that making use of the Æolian Dialect, and Pindar of the Dorick, which shall not be so elegant, this shall give her the advantage. But to discover a truth to thee which shall never be known to any other, he shall be amorous of her, and therefore take pleasure to suffer himself to be overcome by her: Not but that this Woman must be so admirable for her Verses, that the Tanagrians shall erect a Statue to her: she shall also give profitable counsel to Pindar, for as he shall one day be boasting of himself in her presence, she shall pleasantly mock him, and tell him that he knows not how to make any thing, since he knows not how to feign; maintaining peremptorily, that fiction is necessary to handſom Poetry. Pindar afterwards endeavouring to improve this admonition, shall offer her a work wholly fill'd with fictions connected together; but this fair Virgin deriding him again ingeniously, and beholding him with a mocking smile shall tell him, they ought to be interspers'd with judgement, and not cast in by handfuls as he has done. And accordingly, Pindar shall so well profit by her Counsel, that he shall become the wonder of his own age, and of those which shall come after him. The most famous Conqueror of the World, shall esteem him so highly, that having taken Thebes, he shall cause the house to be shewn him where Pindar dwelt, to secure it from being pillag'd, and shall preserve the goods of another Pindar, only in respect to his name. He shall also be happy in dying; for after having requested of the gods, that which is sweetest in life, he shall have the advantage to dye without pain, sleeping upon the knees of a person whom he shall love, at the publick Shews. After which, a Statue shall be erected to him.

But in the next place, dost thou see a goodly person, well made, and of a comely stature, who has a Crown of Flowers upon his head, and a very rich cup in his hand, who is near a Table well furnish'd, and encompass'd with people that are dancing? 'tis the famous Anacreon, the great protector of Joy and Feasts. Oh, I beseech you (interrupted Anacreon) let me see whether you have not craftily adjoyn'd me to so many Poets, that have appear'd to me as well as to Hesiod, since you began to read. Sincerely (answer'd Amilcar) I have made no alteration in translating this place, and I engage to let you see all I am going to read, in the Greek Original. Let Amilcar read on, (said Plotina) for perhaps we shall hear what you would be unwilling to tell us. Indeed (added Valeria) I have understood by Berelisa and Clidamira, that you will not relate any thing concerning your Loves. 'Tis true (answer'd Anacreon) That I do not affect to tell my amorous adventures; and therefore I am loth to let Amilcar read this place; for I should not care to have Calliope discover to you all my secrets. Fear nothing (reply'd Amilcar) a Muse never speaks indiscreetly; and the Translator is intelligent enough. Proceed then (said Anacreon) And accordingly Amilcar began to read again in this manner, at the place where he had left off.

But in the next place, dost thou see a goodly person, well made, and of a comely stature, who has a crown

a crown of Flowers upon his head, and a very rich cup in his hand, who is near a Table well furnish'd, and encompass'd with people that are dancing? 'tis the famous Anacreon, the protector of Joy and Feasts. He shall have a jovial wit, gallant, delicate and natural; his Odes shall last as long as the Empire of Letters shall endure; he shall invent a sort of Verses that shall bear his name; he shall make Elegies, he shall sing the Loves of Circe and Penelope, Lovers of Ulysses, but this Work shall perish; and he shall at length be one of the most famous Poets of all Greece; he shall love after all the ways, wherewith 'tis possible to Love; his principal Mistress shall be named——

Hold, I beseech you (interrupted Anacreon again) and do not name her. I must of necessity name her (answer'd Amilcar) for Plotina makes me a sign to continue my reading; which he did accordingly, thus,

His principle Mistress shall be named Euripile; posterity nevertheless shall believe, that he lov'd two other persons more ardently. He shall be very well belov'd by the Prince of Samos, called Polycrates, who shall one day give him two talents, but Anacreon shall restore them back two days after, and tell him (to refuse him without incivility) that he was two nights without sleep, for thinking how he should employ them, and that he will not be rewarded with a thing that affords nothing but anxious and inquiet cares. In his first youth, returning from a great Feast, he shall meet a Nurse holding a Child in her arms; whom he shall jostle so rudely, that the provoked Woman shall pray the gods, that one day he may as much honor her Son whom he then despis'd; and accordingly, that child shall one day excite love in Anacreon. He shall invent a kind of Lyre with one and twenty strings; and he shall dye by an unexpected and inconsiderable accident, in the midst of a Feast, at the age of fourscore and five years, and shall enjoy after his death an immortal glory.

Whatever the accident be, (interrupted Anacreon) that shall occasion my death, in that age I think I have no great cause to be troubled at it: but whatever Calliope has spoken of it, I conceive I shall not do very ill, to take care always to keep myself from dying young. As for me (answer'd Plotina) I am not dispos'd to contradict you; for besides that in my judgement I apprehend you have reason, I have also a great desire that Amilcar continue his reading, both to let me know those who are to succeed, and to resolve me whether Rome is not likely to have a Poet famous enough, to deserve mentioning by Calliope. After which Amilcar proceeded in this manner. Seest thou that old man with the bald head, in the middle of a field, and above him a great Eagle, holding a Tortoise in her beak? 'tis Æschylus the Athenian; he shall be the first that shall publish Tragedies; he shall add very much to the ornaments of the Theater, and first establish that maxime, not to bloody the Scene. He shall compose fourscore and ten Tragedies, and shall overcome twenty eight times; but being grown very old, he shall be out-done by Sophocles in the spring of his youth; which shall be so grievous to him, that he shall forsake Greece, and go into Sicily; He shall be sublime, grave, magnificent, in his expressions, sometimes even to excess, but often rude and impolish'd, Wherefore the Athenians in following ages shall permit the Poets to correct the Tragedies of Æschylus, and afterward make them pass for new, and obtain prizes with them. Nevertheless, that famous Lycurgus the Law-giver, shall so highly esteem his Works, and those of Sophocles; that he shall cause them to be kept in the publick Archiv's, and erect Statues of Brasses to both of them. Æschylus shall be threatned to be killed with a blow on the head; to avoid which unhappiness, he shall very much affect to walk much in the plain field; but the gods shall punish him for the boldness, to go about to resist destiny; for a great Eagle holding a Tortoise, and taking the bald head of Æschylus for a stone, shall let the same fall upon him to break it; and thus seeking to avoid death, he shall find it, after having had the grief to hear it reproach'd to him by the young Sophocles, that when he did well, he did not know for what reason he did so. In the next place, behold Sophocles the conqueror of Æschylus, and many others: Dost thou not guess by his aspect, that he shall be inclin'd to Love? Theorida and Archippa shall be famous for having been his Mistresses. He shall be the greatest of Tragick Poets; his Works shall have an incomparable beauty and elegance; all shall be exact in them, polite, and accomplish'd; they shall have both sweetness and loftiness: Some shall go about to parallel him to Euripides, of whom I am to speak next; but the more sage opinions shall be for Sophocles. Some shall surname him the Bee, intimating that he shall take only the flower of things; others the Syrène, because he shall very much allure the minds of those that shall see his Works. In his extreme old age, not thinking of ought but to acquire glory, and neglecting his domestick affairs, one of his children shall accuse him of dotage, and go about to deprive him of the management of his estate; but he shall shew the Judges a very handsome piece; which he shall then be making; upon which the accuser shall be more in danger to be declared a fool than the accused. He shall make six and twenty Tragedies, and shall overcome in twenty four; but at last he shall dye of joy, having first overcome once in his decrepit age, and gotten the advantage to preserve all the excellency of his wit to the last. For one telling him, Thou art unhappy, Sophocles, in being no longer capable of Love; he shall answer gallantly, I esteem myself happy for being escaped from his Tyranny, as from that of a furious and insolent Master.

But it is time to shew thee Euripides: dost thou not see a man encompass'd with several Soldiers 'tis he of whom I speak: he hath, as thou seest, a fierce, melancholly and proud aspect; yet his birth shall not be great, and he shall be born in poverty; but he shall have boldness and fierceness. 'Tis true, his merit shall bear him out. In his first youth he shall overcome several times, in the places where there shall be prizes for the exercises of the body. Afterwards, he shall make a great number of Tragedies, of which eight shall be Satyrical. He shall overcome fifteen times, without any sign of Joy discernable in his eyes. Indeed Euripides shall scarce ever laugh, and it shall not be known whether he loves or hates Women, so uniform shall he appear in all his actions. Yet

Sophocles

Sophocles shall reproach him not to hate them, but in the Theater. The people shall one day pray him to change a Verse; but he shall answer, That he writ to teach the people, and not to be taught by them. He shall sometimes take pains with difficulty, and a Poet shall reproach to him, that he made but three Verses in three days. I acknowledge it, shall he answer, and you have made a hundred; but your hundred Verses shall not last three days, and my three Verses shall last not only three hundred years, but even to eternity. In effect, Euripides shall have so great a reputation, that after the Athenians shall have, been overcome under Nicias and Gilippus, the Sicilians, who shall be the Victors, shall spare the lives of several prisoners only because they shall know of the Verses of Euripides, wherewith they shall be so charm'd, that they shall cause them to be continually recited, to the end to learn them, and give the like liberty to those from whom they shall have learnt them. There shall be some also that shall stay in Sicily, and enrich themselves by reciting those Verses which all the World shall admire. But as for the others, who shall return to Athens, thou seest them at his feet, to thank him as their Deliverer, and leave him wholly surpris'd with this glorious adventure. He shall have the honor to be a great friend to Socrates, who shall, for the time to come, be the pattern to all the Sages; and he shall also have the generosity to give him testimonies of his amity after his death. But at length Euripides shall have the unhappiness to discover that his wife shall be unfaithful to him, and love a Comedian; upon which, fearing the mockery of the Comick Poets, he shall forsake his Countrey, and go into Macedonia, where he shall be in favour with the King Archelaus. During his being there, one of those Poets who never make Verses but to beg, and of which kind there shall always be some in the Courts of Princes, shall request something of considerable value of the King of Macedonia; but this Prince being ingenious both to refuse and give, shall command that to be given to Euripides, which the other desired of him; for (shall he say to this importunate person) you deserve to ask without receiving, and Euripides deserves to receive without asking. But at last Euripides shall die miserably; for he shall be torn to pieces by the dogs of that King at a famous hunting. The people shall say, the cause of it was because he interceded for a man who had slain one of those dogs; but the true reason shall be, for that the King scarce minding his hunting any longer, and being almost continually in discourse with Euripides, jealousy and hatred shall both enter into their hearts; so that finding him one day wandring alone, they shall tear him to pieces; and thus shall the famous Euripides die, whom many judicious persons shall scarce dare to place above Sophocles.

But after having seen this illustrious Poet, fix thy eyes awhile upon a very little man, who stands there on one side: he is a Poet, and nam'd Philemon; he shall make Elegies full of very handsome fancy. He shall be so lean, so little, and so light, that the people shall report he always carries lead about him, for fear the wind should carry him away. He shall have a Mistress named Eubis, and shall dye through grief, for not being able to resolve the argument of a Sophister.

He that thou seest in the next place, is the incomparable Menander, whose glory shall be immortal; he is the man that shall refine Comedies, who shall take away the insolent satire from them, and banish all that encounters modesty. He shall have an inclination extraordinarily amorous; for which reason there shall be much true modesty in his works, He shall apprehend perfectly, that a handsome Comedy ought to be a description, or picture of the World, and the passions ordinary to all men; for no Poet shall goe beyond him in skill, and exact observation of manners, customs, passions, and inclinations of each particular of mankind. There shall be other Comick Poets after him, who shall confound all his different styles, and without observing all those varieties which are so necessary to these kind of Pictures, they shall make Kings and Slaves speak after the same manner, and confound the Tragick style with the Comick. These cannot without injustice be equall'd to Menander, who shall be gallant and polite throughout, who shall have nothing but what either instructs or diverts. Whence there shall be in the sequel of time, a most grave and famous Author, who shall prefer Menander a thousand degrees above him, that shall be the most excellent amongst all others: Menander shall be accus'd by one nam'd Cratinus, to be sufficiently addicted to play the plagiarist in Authors that preceded him; but this Cratinus shall be one of those dangerous sons of Envy, of which there shall always be some, as long as there are persons of virtue: that is one of those malicious criticks, who seek not to instruct their age they live in, but only to injure those they see more esteem'd than themselves. Menander shall compose an hundred and nine Comedies, and shall be Victor only in eight; but posterity shall do him the justice to believe, that it was by reason of the factions of his Envyers. He shall be Disciple to Theophrastus, a great friend to Demetrius Phalereus, and so esteem'd by the Kings of Aegypt and Macedonia, that they shall send a Fleet and Ambassadors to him, to oblige him to come to them. But, in fine, being yet in the flower of his age, he shall be drown'd as he is swimming in the Port of Piræus.

Look upon him that I shew thee next; he shall be named Philemon, and shall overcome Menander several times, rather through good Fortune than merit, though there will be handsome fancies in several places of his Works: but Menander speaking to him of his victories, shall smilingly say to him, Art not thou asham'd to have overcome me? He is destinat to die with laughter, at the sight of some uncouth spectacle; he shall live fourscore and seventeen years, and shall make fourscore and ten Comedies.

He that thou seest upon that great Theater, and whom such a croud of people attentively listen to, is Aristophanes; he shall be of low birth, and yet of great reputation, and taking to himself a middle way between the excessive licentiousness of ancient Comedy, and the regularity of the New, he shall please the generality of people. His style shall be sharp, subtle, elegant, full of ingenious fetches and railleries; but he shall not scruple to offend the fancy of the virtuous sort of people, so that he may but give divertisement to the multitude. He shall be extraordinarily bold in speaking against against all the World ; inſomuch that he ſhall make a Comedy againſt a Tribune of the people where-in he ſhall ſpeak ſo ſharply, that no Comedian will venture to act that part ; whereupon being led by his Satyricall inclination, he ſhall act it himſelf, and for that reaſon be condemned to pay a great Fine. That which ſhall blot the reputation of Ariſtophanes, is, that he ſhall be an enemy to Socrates, and make a Comedy againſt him ; but on the other ſide, he ſhall have the honor to have his Epitaph made by a great Philoſopher, after a glorious manner ; which ſhall ſerve one day for a document to the World, that all great men are not always of the ſame judgement, ſince another great Author ſpeaking of Ariſtophanes, ſhall ſay that in his works the Tragick and Comick ſtyle are confounded together, the high and the low, the ſublime and the familiar, very many ſuperfluous words, cold raileries, and impudence diffuſ'd throughout. He that thou ſeeſt next is Lycophron, an Author famous for his obſcurity. He ſhall be of the number of thoſe ſeven Tragick Poets, who ſhall compoſe the Pleiades, and he ſhall be ingeniouſly compar'd to a certain obſcure Star, which is in that conſtellation. He ſhall be born in the City of Chalcis in Eubæa, and ſhall be ſlain with the ſhot of an arrow.

Now take notice of that man who goes forth of a Temple, and ſeems to be in amazement ; 'tis Calimachus the Cyrenian, who ſhall make Elegies, Epigrams, and other Works, with ſufficient approbation. He ſhall make one among the reſt that ſhall live a long time, of which I will tell thee the ſubject, to the end thou mayſt underſtand, Poets may ſometimes have boldneſs which lead them out of the common road, provided they be manag'd with judgement. Berenice, Queen of Ægypt, ſeeing Ptolomy her Husband going to the War, ſhall devote her hair, which ſhall be very graceful, to Venus, in caſe he return victorious : after which, this Prince coming home Conqueror, Berenice ſhall cut off her hair, and carry it her ſelf to the Temple of Venus, where it ſhall not be found the next morning. A famous Astrologer who ſhall deſire to court that Queen, ſhall profeſs that he ſaw it in the Heavens, and that it makes a new Conſtellation there. And indeed having really diſcovered one that he had never ſeen till then, it ſhall for ever after be call'd, The hair of Berenice : This is the ſubject of Galimachus's Poem, wherein making uſe of the boldneſs permitted to great Poets, he ſhall introduce the hair of Berenice ſpeaking, to the end it may appear, there is nothing which an excellent Poet cannot make to ſpeak becomingly.

The next thou ſeeſt is Aratus, who ſhall be born in the City of Soli in Silicia ; he ſhall not be very learn'd in Astrologie, and ſhall nevertheless make a very handſome Poem concerning the Stars and their courſes : He ſhall alſo compoſe another very elegant work, and poſterity ſhall judge of it by the merit of thoſe who ſhall tranſlate it ; for the firſt ſhall be the Father of Latine Eloquence, who ſhall be named Cicero ; the ſecond ſhall be a Prince of high accompliſhments, who ſhall be call'd Germanicus ; the third a very amorous Poet, whoſe name ſhall be Ovid ; and the fourth a man of principal quality call'd Ruffus Avienus ; ſo that I allure thee no other work ſhall ever light upon more noble Interpreters.

Then turn thine eyes upon the admirable The- ocritus ; he ſhall be born in Syracuse, and ſhall make Elegies, which ſhall acquire him immortal glory ; he ſhall ſpeak ill of Hiero, the Tyrant of his Countrey, who ſhall pardon him the firſt time ; but as Poets do not eaſily hold their peace, the ſecond time the Tyrant ſhall put him to death, and there ſhall remain no more of Theocritus but his Works, and his fair reputation.

He that thou ſeeſt next him, is Moschus, a Poet of the ſame ſtrain, who ſhall have a gallant and delicate wit. He ſhall make an Idyllium upon Run-away Cupid, which ſhall be imitated in all Languages (ſo gallant ſhall the invention of it ſeem) and happily expreſs'd in few Verſes.

Thoſe two Men whom thou ſeeſt together, are the two Parthenii, of whoſe Writings nothing ſhall remain, and of whom I ſhall ſpeak by and by, when I come to ſpeak of Virgil and Ovid.

Laſtly (Hefode) behold the laſt famous Poet among the Greeks ; he ſhall be of Cilicia, of the City of Anazarba ; he ſhall be called Oppian, and ſhall be ſon of one of the principal Citizens, named Ageſilaus, who after having govern'd a long time, ſhall addiſt himſelf entirely to Philoſophy, to the end to inſtruct his Son therein. The Emperor Severus paſſing through this place, neither Oppian nor Ageſilaus, ſhall go to ſalute him ; which the Emperor taking ill, ſhall baniſh them into an Iſland almoſt deſart at that time, which in the revolution of ages ſhall be inhabited, by people very courageous, and of a moſt noble race. During this exile, Oppian ſhall compoſe five Books concerning Fiſhing, and ſix concerning Hunting ; he ſhall dedicate his Work to Antoninus, ſon of Severus, who not only ſhall recall him from exile, but being charm'd with his Verſes, ſhall recompence each of them with a piece of Gold ; whereupon thenceforth they ſhall be call'd, The Golden Verſes of Oppian. Beſides that, they ſhall be worthy of that Title, only in reſpect of their Elegance. After this, he ſhall return into his own Countrey, and die thereat the age of thirty years ; his Citizens ſhall erect a Statue to him, and inſcribe an Epitaph upon his Tomb, which ſhall intimate, that the gods cauſ'd his death out of envy ; becauſe, if he had liv'd long, he would have ſurpaſs'd all mortals.

Thus Hefode, thou ſeeſt who ſhall be thy ſucceſſors in Greece ; but if Poetry die amongſt the Greeks, 'tis only to revive again among the Romans, who ſhall learn it of them. So that thou ſhalt not be leſs the Father of the Latine, than of the Greek Poetry, and in what place ſoever Verſes ſhall be made, the name of Hefode ſhall be in eſteem. No doubt thou art willing to have me tell thee, whether the Latine Poetry ſhall be able to ſurpaſs the Greek, which queſtion ſhall be the ſubject of very great diſpute. Yet let it ſuffice thee to know, that the Romans ſhall take Poetry from the Greeks, and that the moſt curious Criticks amongſt them, ſhall believe they do much, when they ſhall equal the Poets of their own Nation, to thoſe of the Greeks. They ſhall even oftentimes prefer them before them ; becauſe 'tis the cuſtom of all men to be prejudic'd againſt their own age ; and a very great Conqueror ſhall one day call a Poet, who ſhall be named Terence. but a half-Manander, though that Terence muſt be one of the moſt perfect Latine Poets. However, I will tell thee, that the Greeks and the Romans ſhall on either either side have their peculiar excellencies and defenders. The Greeks shall without doubt have the glory of invention, and withal a certain kind of greater sprightliness and pleasantness, and be more proper for divertisement. But otherwise, they shall be less exact, more diffuse and prolix, more subject to speak things unprofitable, attributing less to Art than to Nature. The Romans shall render Poetry more solid and more judicious, their Works shall have more Rule and Art, and consequently some kind of less licentiousness: and there shall come another time, wherein Poetry being become French, shall seem, in growing old, to have taken yet more severity, than the Greek or the Latine; for it shall indulge fewer things to itself than the rest; and withal, it shall very rarely have any of their graces and elegancies. In the mean time, to tell thee concerning Latine Poetry in particular, and to let thee see that famous Poetrick Genealogie, which I have promised thee, I must —

I beseech you (said Plotina then to Amilcar) suffer me to interrupt your reading, to tell you that I die with desire, not only that the Latine Poets may surpass the Greek in the excellency of their Verses, but likewise in riches and good fortune; for I have so much pity to see some of those great Poets poor, that I should be infinitely troubled, that that should one day be reproacht to the Romans, which I reproach to the Greeks. And moreover, to speak truth, I know not how it should come to pass, that many persons will willingly take upon them an employment of so little profit. If you please to consider (answer'd Herminius) how many people go to the War, with little profit, you will not wonder at the number of those that addict themselves to make Verses? although Poetry very rarely improves the fortunes, but is rather prejudicial to them; for this employment is of less danger, and greater pleasure. You have reason (reply'd Amilcar) and besides, the greatest part of those that addict themselves to make Verses, are born Poets, and cannot hinder themselves from being such. But yet I would know (said Plotina) why poverty always follows Poetry: The reason is (answer'd Amilcar) because great men are either ignorant or covetous. For my part (added Plotina) I look upon it as a just punishment inflicted by the gods, for that the most part of Poets, as I have heard, oftentimes give a thousand praises to people that deserve them not; and for that they sacrifice rather to Fortune, than to Virtue. But however, I conceive it fit to leave you to continue your story. Accordingly Amilcar resum'd the place where he stopt. But it is time to make thee change thy object.

Therefore lift up thine eyes and see proud Italy (such as she shall be one day, when she comes to be Mistress of the World) in the same place where thou sawest all Greece.

But, to arrest thy sight to one single object, look upon that man with a severe countenance; 'tis Livius Andronicus, who shall write Tragedies, of which in time, nothing shall be left but some fragments, which shall give posterity to know, that he had a kind of driness and rudeness in his Wit.

In the next place take notice of Ennius, and thou wilt observe by his aspect, that he will one day become a gallant man, and a lover of joy. He shall be a Native of Tarentum; he shall imagine himself to have the soul of Homer: he shall write the History of his own Countrey in Verse, and making his own Epitaph himself, he shall forbid all persons to lament him, because he lives still, and shall always live in the memory of men. Nevertheless his Works shall perish, and nothing be left of them but some fragments, which shall evidence that he was nervous, and of good invention.

Then fix thy sight upon that man, whose attire is plain, and whom thou seest employ'd in turning about an Engine, which serves to make Meal, thou wouldst think he were able to make nothing worthy of immortality; yet he that thou seest, and who shall be called Plautus, shall write Comedies, which shall resist the depredation of time. He shall be born in Umbria, of low parentage; at first he shall sell his Comedies, afterwards he shall become a Merchant, and undo himself; and then poverty pressing him very heavily, he shall serve in those matters thou seest him employ'd about, But while he is at this Trade, he shall compose some of his Works, and it shall be said one day of him, That if my companions and I were to speak Latine, we should speak like Plautus; though this Elogium be more suitable to Terence, whom thou shalt see by and by, whose style shall without doubt be more noble, and more pure. Plautus shall principally propose to his imitation, Epicharmus and Aristophanes, two Greek Poets, whom I shew'd thee; his Comedies shall be full of Wit and pleasant Conceits, but not very modest. Indeed he shall better represent slaves, courtisans, and those of the baser sort of people, than honest persons; like some Painters, whose odd fancy is better at representing poor crippled and deformed soldiers, than Princes and Heroes. In process of time he shall seem something obscure, because he shall love to take the liberty of making extraordinary words, and employing those which are peculiar, to the eloquence of the vulgar. But however, there shall be handsome strains in his Works, and raillery shall be neatly couch'd in them.

Look next upon Statius Cacilius, a Gaul, he shall have the glory to be prefer'd by many, above all other Authors of the Theater; he shall be a great friend to Ennius, and so highly respected by Terence, that he shall compose nothing but what he first exposes to his censure. Nevertheless, time shall not respect his Works; for there shall scarce any thing of time survive.

As for Accius Pacuvius whom thou seest there, there are not things enough to tell thee of him, to detain thy sight longer upon him.

But 'tis not so with that African whom I shew thee, for he merits to have all thy attention; 'tis that Terence I but now mention'd; he shall be born at Carthage, and bred up a slave at Rome, by Terentius Lucanus a Senator, who shall cause him to be educated with very much care, and set him at liberty when he comes beyond the years of Childhood. Terence shall take the famous Menander for his pattern, as Plautus took Epicharmus and Aristophanes for his. He shall have a particular amity with all persons of eminent quality in Rome, especially with an illustrious man, named Scipio, and another called Latius, who shall also assist him to compose his handsome Comedies; for they shall not be like those people of quality, who conceive ignorance ignorance best becomes persons of condition, and that it is either shameful or unprofitable to be learned. There shall be nothing so pure, noble and delicate, as his Writings; nothing that can better express the manners and genius of persons of all sorts. His Comedies shall seem better at the hundredth time's reading, than at the first; and they shall be the delight of all those that have an exquisite gust; yet only six of them shall be transmitted to posterity, which also shall be for the most part imitated from Menander, who shall be his great Original; nevertheless, they shall not favour of the constraint or lowness of imitators, but they shall be as so many Master-pieces. He shall dye with sorrow, as he returns from Greece to Rome, for having lost by shipwrack, an hundred and eight Comedies which he had made, and some incomparable Satyrs.

He that thou see'st next, is Caius Lucilius, who shall be a person of very great honesty; and so it shall be out of a sentiment of Virtue, that he will compose Satyrs. There shall be something extremely diverting in his Writings, but much inequality shall always attend them. 'Tis true, his defects shall not be long reproacht to him; for his works shall perish, as well as those of Turpilus and Africanus, two Comick Poets, whom thou may'st see standing on his right hand.

But the same fate shall not attend Lucretius: Look upon him as a Poet of an admirable genius, yet he shall have something of rudeness and impoliteness in several places: but the fault of the age he shall live in, and the quality of his argument, shall be the cause of it. In some excellent places, and in his poetical digressions, it shall be as much as the greatest Poet of the world shall be able to do to surpass him. He shall die mad, by occasion of being too much beloved; for a Mistress whom he shall love, thinking her self not sufficiently loved by him, shall give him a water to drink, which shall cause his death, in stead of augmenting his love.

In the next place take notice of Lucius Pomponius, who shall invent a new sort of Comedies, called Atellane, see also near him a man that has a cheerful and sufficiently ridiculous countenance, 'tis Laberius the Author of the Mimicks, that is, of a kind of sportful Comedy, set forth in gestures and postures.

See then a man of quality, named Quintus Catullus, he shall make two Epigrams, which shall pass happily to the latter ages, though all his other Verses perish, and there shall be one of those Epigrams, which shall one day give occasion to the composition of several little works, which shall bear the title of The fair House-wife.

After him, behold several mean Poets in a crowd, and amongst the rest Publius Syrus a slave, freed for his Wits sake, who shall surpass all others in the Mimicks, and Laberius himself that invented them: but I hasten to shew thee the famous Catullus.

Observe him therefore as one of the most gallant and elegant Latine Poets; but see near him also the fair Leshia his Mistress, who shall be reported to assist him in the composition of his verses.

Catullus shall be born at Verona, and be universally esteemed; his Epigrams shall be divine, although they be not always piquant, as those of Martial, whom thou shalt see by and by, but they shall have an admirable gracefulness, both for the manner and for the expressions. He shall look upon Callimachus as one of his originals, and shall translate that work concerning Berenice's hair which I told thee of: In brief, his Epigrams shall be of an extream sweet strain, and of so peculiar a gallantry and politeness, that none shall be able to equal him. He shall make several against the chief man of his times, and the master of his Countrey, under the name of Mamurra, but that great man shall not revenge himself, but favor him as formerly, because he shall have more esteem for his works, than indignation against his person, he shall die at thirty years of age, but his glory shall be out of the reach of Fate.

Now redouble thy attention Hesiod, for I am going to shew thee the greatest and most excellent of Latine Poets. Dost thou not perceive a house sufficiently rustical, before the door of which are all conveniences requisite for the making of earthen vessels? and dost thou not see at a little distance from thence, a great Poplar, which surpasses all those round about it; 'tis the birth-place of the great Virgil, whom thou may'st see musing along a meadow; as he shall do one day when he shall compose some of his Eclogues. He shall be the Son of a Potter, near a City that shall be called Mantua; his Mother shall dream that she shall bring forth a Lawrel, which she shall see grow to infinity; being delivered, she shall plant a sprig of poplar according to the custom, which shall in a little time become a great Tree, surpassing all those of the Countrey, and which afterwards shall be lookt upon by the people with veneration, and named Virgil's tree. This excellent man shall addict himself to the study of Natural Philosophy, the Mathematicks, and Physick, which he shall choose for his profession, and wherein he shall excell. Afterwards by his great worth, he shall acquire the friendship of a great Emperor, named Augustus, and of his Favorite, the famous Mecenas, our love and delight. He shall never offend any person, and never shew the least token of vanity, though Poets in general will be sufficiently subject to this defect. He shall have modesty in perfection; and in brief, shall be a real honest person, as well amiable for his virtue, and for his manners, as admirable for his wit. He shall compose Eclogues in imitation of Theocritus, which shall be infinitely charming; thou shalt have the same glory of being imitated by him, when he shall compose a work, which he shall intitle Georgicks; and which amongst the great Masters, shall pass for his Masterpiece: it being certain, that in respect of art and verity, it shall transcend all other things whatsoever; though very many persons, and those judicious too, shall wish rather to have been authors of his Eclogues, or some book of his Aeneid, for 'tis indeed a great glory, to be exact and accomplisht throughout, but 'tis a greater in Poetry to effect, to charm, and to ravish. He shall imitate Homer in his Aeneid, and the advantage shall be attributed to him, for having far surpassed him, as well as Theocritus, in the things wherein he shall have imitated him. But though Homer be less regular than

Virgil

Virgil shall be, yet he shall not fail to have his graces; for he shall be more divertising and less severe, and shall abound much in different styles, of which Virgil shall be wholly unfurnished. But in brief, it shall be said to the praise of Virgil, That never man had with an extream handsome genius, and great stock of wit, so excellent a judgement, nor knew so perfectly as he, how far 'tis fit to go in Poetry, and where to stop. But in the middle of his glory he shall dye at Brundisium, whither he shall go to salute Augustus at his return from the East. At his death he shall command his Aeneis to be burnt, not being able to resolve to leave it imperfect to posterity; but Tucca and Varus, his friends, assuring him that Augustus will never permit it, he shall consent that it be preserved, on condition that it be published according as he shall leave it, without changing any thing in it, not even so much as some Verses, which shall be but half made. But to render him as glorious after his death, as he shall be during his life, Augustus shall make excellent Verses against that unjust clause of his Testament. Judge then Hesiod, what glory attends thee, being able one day to count Augustus and Virgil amongst thy descendants.

But this is not all yet; for behold him that appears there, 'tis Horace, whose name shall seem to be fatal to extraordinary men; he that thou seest shall be, without scruple, the most gallant of all the Latine Poets; his Father shall be a native of a village of Apulia, and a Son of a freed man, but for that he shall have a mind above his condition, he shall educate his son with as much care, as Princes ought to bring up their own Children. Horace shall have a particular friendship with Mecenas, and likewise with Augustus, who desiring to make use of him for his Letters which he shall write to his friends, shall see himself refused by him without being offended. Horace shall have as much wealth as he shall desire; and he shall say one day, to the glory of Mecenas, and his own, I have as much as I need, and if I desired more, you would not refuse it me. Horace shall be sufficiently cholerick, he shall have a voluptuous soul, and be of the sect of Epicurus, which he shall disclaim at the end of his days, he shall love liberty above all things, and so shall pass his life absolutely free, and please himself chiefly in the Countrey, because there is greater freedom there than elsewhere. He shall make two sorts of works, his Odes which shall be perfectly divine, and his Satyrs, which shall be incomparable not to mention a discourse of competent length, concerning the art of Poetry, wherein shall be very excellent things. There shall be some Odes of Love, others of carowing, and others perfectly grand and heroical, and all inimitable; so great freedom and facility of Wit shall be seen in them, happy boldness, gallant conceits, and above all, a choice of noble and natural expressions, which cannot be too highly valued. His works shall be throughout affecting, they shall surprise by their little constraint; for he shall pass from one subject to another, without scrupling to forsake any, where it seems good to him, and to go where he shall not be expected. As for his Satyrs, they shall contain the most exquisite and delicate morality, mingled with the most subtle and real raillery, and never shall any other so pleasantly deride vices, as he, nor so ingeniously render them ridiculous. Yet it shall be less impossible (if I may so speak) to imitate him in his Satyrs than in his Odes. But to conclude, he shall die at the age of fifty seven years, after having acquired a glory which nothing can destroy.

After him, cast thy eyes upon Tibullus, a Roman Knight, handsome, well made, and of a good port; he shall be rich and become poor; he shall have so amorous an inclination, that the multitude of his loves shall proceed less from his inconstancy, than from his inclination to love. He shall chiefly celebrate in his Verses, four of his Mistresses, Delia, Sulpitia, Neara, and Nemesis. He shall have a particular amity with one of the eminentest persons of Rome, named Messala Corvinus, and shall dye in a voyage that he shall make with him, after having had the glory to be the first Author of the Latine Elegy. The style of his Verses shall be amorous, soft, easie, clear, neat, and of extream sweetness and elegance.

In the next place behold Propertius, an other Roman Knight, he shall imitate Callimachus, Mimnermus, and Philetas, whom I shewed thee before. Behold also near him, the fair Cynthia his Mistress, who shall sometimes help him to make Verses, as Lesbia shall Catullus. His Elegies shall be so handsome, that though the best Judges shall prefer Tibullus before him, yet others shall be of the contrary opinion. There shall be more wit, more conceits, and more amorous sentences in his Verses, but less passion, facility, and elegance.

Dost thou not see at the right hand of Propertius another Poet? 'tis Varus, who shall live at the same time. Horace, and all the rest of the same profession, shall celebrate him as a great Epique Poet, but there shall remain nothing of his but twelve or thirteen verses; so that one day his writings shall not be known, but by the commendations of others.

But it is time to shew thee the famous Ovid, a Roman Knight; dost thou not also see near him a very comely person? 'tis his wife, who shall be nam'd Perilla, and taught by him to make Verses. He shall be born at Sulmo, the Metropolis of the Peligni in Italy, near the Marsi, he shall be at first designed by his father to the Law, and shall succeed well in it; but having all his life had a great inclination for Poetry, he shall renounce that profession, and give himself wholly to the other. He shall be a particular friend to those of the highest quality in Rome, and of very delightful conversation. He shall marry thrice; he shall divorce his two first Wives, and keep the third, which thou seest near him. He shall be banished by Augustus, for having made love to the Princess Julia his daughter, whose deportment shall be very disorderly; some shall believe the cause to have been for being amorous of Livia, wife of that Emperor; but the true reason shall be so concealed, that many different and improbable conjectures shall be made of it. The place of his exile shall be Pontus, a Province of Asia, near the Getes and the Sarmatians. He shall compose many works, the greatest of all which shall be his Metamorphosis, which he shall imitate from the Greek of Parthenius, of the Island of Chios, as to the design only; for he shall much more amplify them; his stile shall shall have much wit, facility, and copiousness, but more of native Ornament than Art. For the most part he shall abandon himself to his own genius, and not always allow himself the leisure to choose his conceits and expressions; but yet he shall be so extremely amorous, so passionate, and full of wit, that he shall be accounted admirable throughout all Ages. His Books of the Art of Loving, and the Remedies of Love, shall get him a great reputation. But it may be said, the Flower of Latine Poetry shall dye with him, for his successors endeavoring to imitate his Wit, his copiousness, his conceits and subtle fancies, shall leave the good way, and wander, so that insensibly, after his days, the Latine Poetry shall begin to lose that sweetness and natural Majesty, which during so long time, rendered it admirable.

For behold that Spaniard with the fierce countenance thou seest appear there; 'tis Seneca the Tragedian; he shall have much wit, but he shall favor of the tumidness of his Nation: he shall be born at Corduba, and in process of time, some shall attribute part of his Works to a Philosopher of the same name, whose mind shall be of the same temper with his.

In the next place, behold Lucan, who shall be born in the same City; he shall have many admirers, but whose Work, to speak equitably, shall not be perfectly admirable saving in its pieces. He shall be justly accused for not making a conclusion, and for flying always so high, that he cannot be followed without weariness. He shall one day have a Translator among the Gauls, who shall get much glory by his traduction. His wife Palla Argentaria, shall make Verses as well as he, but at length an Emperor called Nero, shall put him to death, not so much for having conspired against the State, as to deliver himself from a Rival in Poetry whose Works shall be better received by the people than his.

After him, see an imitator of Virgil, called Statius; and near him his wife Claudia, who shall be illustrious for her wit; she shall make Verses too, as well as that of Lucan. This Poet shall fall much short of Virgil, by endeavoring to surpass him. In brief he shall be great and sublime, but most often inflated and obscure.

Then consider Silius Italicus, a Spaniard also so great an admirer of Virgil, that he shall reverence his Tomb. He shall write a Poem of Seventeen Books, concerning the War of the Carthaginians against the Romans; he shall be Consul of Rome, the year wherein the cruel Nero shall be slain.

So likewise Valerius Flaccus, who shall write of the Argonauts: but do not stay upon this sight; for though these must be good Poets, yet they shall not be of the same rank with the others thou hast seen.

But I am going to shew thee two that shall better deserve to detain thy view; they are Juvenal and Martial; for though they are not to have all the excellency of the Age of Augustus, yet they shall have the advantage to be the first in the style they shall choose.

See therefore Juvenal, who appears first; his Satyrs shall be less mirthful and delicate than those of Horace, but full of wit and life. Horace shall always laugh, and never be in choler; Juvenal shall frequently be enraged, and laugh more rarely. These two sorts of Satyrs shall divide the Wits, and there shall no doubt, be some very handsome things, and sometimes also very pleasant, in Juvenal. He shall live under Domitian, he shall be son of a Freed-man; but having in one of his Satyrs reflected upon one of the persons in favor, he shall be sent in Commission at the Age of fourscore years, to the farthest part of Aegypt, where he shall dye in a kind of exile.

But then behold Martial, who advances a famous Author of Epigrams, and who shall merit to be the first in his kind, Not but that the Epigrams of Catullus shall please more, because they shall be Epigrams throughout (as one day a great Man amongst the Gauls shall say) whereas those of Martial shall not be so but at the end: but indeed they shall be in a manner of two differing kinds. Catullus shall be full of elegance, delicacy, and the neat raillerie of the better sort; Martial, on the other side, shall have a raillerie less polite, but quick, piquant, and subtle, and shall not want elegance in some places. That which shall be good in him shall be excellent, but there shall be several mean Epigrams amongst others, and several which shall appear flat in remoter Ages, because the difference of manners and custom shall cause their agreeableness not to be comprehended. Martial shall be born in Spain; he shall be a very gallant Man; and shall live under an Emperor whose name shall be Domitian.

Next to him I must shew thee a Poet named Persius, although he is to precede Juvenal, under the reign of Claudius. His Works shall have resemblance with those of that famous Author; they shall be very highly esteemed of in his own days, but in more remote times he shall appear very obscure to the most Learned, yet he shall have this glory; that a person of high quality, great courage, and excellent Wit, after having been dangerously wounded in War, in an occasion wherein he shall signalize himself, having no other Book to divert him during his sickness but this, shall translate it admirably for his pleasure, and make a Copy which shall far transcend the original, though he must also make some things of his own incomparably more handsome. But in brief, after Martial, Poetry shall resemble nothing but old age and decrepitude.

Yet there shall be under Theodosius one Claudian, who shall have a handsome facility. There shall also be born in Gaul upon the bank of the Garonne, a Poet called Ansonius, who shall be Tutor to an Emperor, and afterwards Roman Consul, and shall compose things full of Wit and Learning. But after all, it may be said, that Latine Poetry shall dye together with the Language. 'Tis true, after this Language shall be no longer in use but among the Learned, there shall be Italian Poets in the Ages remote from that of Augustus, who shall cause Latine Poetry to flourish again miraculously. But since the multitude of Poets can never be found but amongst the living Languages, I must shew thee in the same Country, as it were another Nation and another Scene for Poetry.

For my part (said Plotina then) I am highly pleased with the Prediction of Calliope, and though I am sufficiently glad to be living at present, yet I think I should not be very sorry to be in the days of Augustus, to see the Poets rich then, and great Lords worthy persons. Being I am not certain what I should be at that time, (answer'd Amilcar) 'tis as good to content my self with being what I am, and proceed with my reading. Which he continued thus,

Behold now, O Hesiod, the same Italy again, but imagine to thy self, that it has been over-run by an inundation of foreign Nations, that it has changed its government, manners, and language, that it has groaned for several ages under barbarisme and ignorance, that it is now beginning again to understand good literature, and to remember its antient politeness. Thou seest there the first Italian Poet, who shall one day be famous; but consider him as a man, who shall choose a very difficult Subject to treat of in Verse, and express himself so obscurely, that he shall scarce be understood by them of his own age. He shall be born in a City that shall be named Florence; he shall be known by the name of Dante, and have scarce any thing but Fiction in his Verses.

But now turn thy eyes upon that pleasant Valley, bounded by a great rock, at the foot of which is a famous Fountain, which alone gives rise to a River, and which being six months high, and six months low, shall pass for one of the wonders of Nature: See on the right hand of this lovely vally (in which are seen an hundred Rivulets of living water, and inartificial channels) a little Meadow, wherein is a man who appears very sad, and muses profoundly; 'tis Petrarch, who shall be born in the Town of Arezzo. He shall love a fair and virtuous Virgin, whose name shall be Laura, and shall have a very handsome house in Valchiusa; so shall the Valley thou seest, be one day called, because 'tis enclosed almost on every side. 'Tis he that shall give a perfect example of constant and honest Love; He shall love Laura both living and dead, and he shall preserve so much respect in his passion, that it shall be hard to conjecture, whether he were lov'd again or no, so full shall his Verses be of discretion. Nevertheless, they shall be very amorous, and he shall compose more in lamenting the death of Laura, than in extolling her during her life. He shall love her one and twenty years with an equal ardour, and they shall both love with so great innocence, that the glory of their Love shall last, as long as that of Petrarch's Verses, who shall have the honor to be the first of his Nation, that understood to speak handsomely of Love in Verse. He shall be as deformed as his Mistress shall be fair, but he shall have so handsome a Wit, a Heart so noble, and a Soul so virtuous, that he shall be esteem'd by all the most considerable persons of his time. Whereby he shall have many marks of honor during his life, and shall be crowned Poet with magnificence in the chief City of the World.

In the next place, behold Ferrara, a very famous City, and in the principal place of it a man who has an ingenious aspect; 'tis the famous Ariosto, who shall make very handsome Comedies and Satyrs; but above all a great Poem, so full of different inventions, that though he ought to be accused for being unequal'd, yet he shall not fail to be admirable in a thousand respects. For he shall have a certain kind of diverting variety, which shall charm his Readers. He shall have a Style easy, natural, and amorous, the negligence of which shall not hinder it's facility from being extreme delightful, and though regularity must sometimes be wanting in him, yet he shall please almost perpetually. It were to be wish'd indeed, that he would retrench some places of his Works, which will not be modest enough, but there shall be several others, in which nothing shall be found wanting. His defects shall be his diffuseness, and excess of fancy, and a certain negligence which shall hinder him from rejecting some of his conceits and inventions. But to conclude, he shall be excellent among the excellent of his own Nation.

But then turn thy view upon an illustrious and unfortunate person, lawful Heir of the glory of Homer and Virgil. He shall cause shame to the Princes of his own times; and he shall be the greatest honour of Italy for Poetry. 'Tis the famous Tasso I speak of, the greatest genius of his Nation, and one of the most judicious Poets of the World. Almost in his childhood he shall make an heroic Poem, extremely ingenious, and begin to give the World an essay of his abilities, for great Poetry. Afterwards he shall make another, the Fable of which shall be wonderful, and yet probable, and the styles of it various, agreeable, and natural; the texture of his Works shall have no confusion, he shall relate things handsomely, he shall excite compassion and admiration, he shall be very amorous in several places, and shall sometimes express very much in few Words, though the language in which he is to write, be not so proper for that purpose as the Latine. He shall first begin to introduce Shepherds upon the Theater, and shall make a Pastoral Comedy, which shall be the pattern of all others, and a Master-piece which many shall imitate, but none ever equal: he shall also make several other commendable Works; but it sufficeth to tell thee only of the most famous. Tasso shall be born in a Town near a very fair City, which shall be called Naples, at that time; yet it shall one day befall him as it did Homer, that several places shall challenge to themselves the honor of his birth: he shall be of a race so illustrious, that his Ancestors shall have been Lords of a considerable City; but his family being ruin'd, his Father, whose name shall be Bernardo Tasso, shall desire to addict him to employments of profit, and hinder him from following Poetry, though himself also should have a good faculty in Verse. But in brief, through many adventures Tasso shall go to Rome, afterwards to Ferrara, France, Mantua, and return back into his own Countrey, and then again into Ferrara; but into what place soever he goes, he shall find glory and poverty. Fortune shall begin to persecute him in Ferrara; Love shall be the principal cause of all his unhappineses; for he shall be enamour'd on the Sister of his Master, and render the name of Leonora, famous by his passion and his Verse. Yet he shall conceal his Love as long as he is able, and amongst three Women of the same name endeavour to disguise the truth. He shall also fight, with heroic courage, against a man that shall have discover'd something of it; but at length he shall forsake Ferrara, and spend several years' wandering and roaming about, without any subsistence. He shall be in prison, and have a fear to be poison'd; and at length see himself so unhappy, and overwhelmed with misfortunes, that the very greatness of his mind shall serve serve to render him more miserable, since it shall be one of the causes of the loss of his reason. He shall not have so much happiness as to be ignorant of his folly, and he shall have intervals of Reason, which shall let him know, that he is the most unhappy of all men: however, he shall see his Virtue respected, even by a Captain of Thieves, who having besieged a place without knowing of his being there, shall change his resolution as soon as he knows it, and deprive himself of a great booty, only for his sake; thus he shall be the object of all the World's admiration. In the meantime, the injustice of the great ones of his times, shall be detested by all honest people of the following ages, who shall judge it strange, that the greatest Wit of the World, and most illustrious person of his age, should live without being Master of so much as a poor Cottage of his own, to hide his unhappiness, although he has been universally esteem'd, and liv'd in several of the greatest Courts of Europe. But this shall not be the last time, that this kind of injustice shall be seen amongst Grandees, who, for the most part, are totally ignorant of the art of rewarding Virtue. But in fine, Tasso after having endur'd a thousand misfortunes, and fear'd all those that might possibly befall him, and so consequently undergone them, shall dye when he shall be ready to be crowned Poet at Rome, as Petrarch shall have been; but as for his glory, it shall never dye, and his Aminta shall come in time to be translated into the French, Spanish, English, High and Low German Languages.

But having now shewn thee Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto and Tasso, behold also Bembo, Caro, and Guarnini; the first shall have an admirable purity of style; the second a rare faculty of conceit in all his Verses; and the third shall have so much wit, that he shall be blam'd for it as an imperfection.

After these, behold four Poets, whose Poetry, though wholly of a different kind, shall deserve all the praise that can be given to things of that nature; namely, le Bernia, le Maure, le Molza, and le Caporale.

Next them, see there Tassone, who by a Poem ingeniously pleasant, shall merit high applause.

Behold also Marini, who with his multitude of Writings, shall astonish his Readers. See, in the next place, one Fulvio Testi, whose magnificence and purity shall have an air, both great and natural together, and who shall in a manner, revive the genius and style of Hurace.

See likewise one Gratiani, who, by a great Poem, shall acquire much honor.

And then see several Italian Poets in a croud, which I do not name to thee, because I am impatiently desirous to shew thee a lovely Countrey, where my Companions and I, after having gone almost round the World, shall one day fix our residence.

'Tis France, Hesjode, I tell thee of; consider it as a place which must be our new Sanctuary.

But to let thee see the progress, Poetry shall make there, behold a man whose aspect is sufficiently uncouth, and his attire extraordinary; he shall be nam'd John de Meun, and shall compose a Work which shall bear a great vogue a long time; but he shall be rather inspir'd by his own capricious humour than by us.

Do'st thou not see in the next place a Poet of quality? he shall live under a King that shall love the Muses, and who shall make four Verses upon the Tomb of the fair Laura, Petrarch's Mistress. This Poet shall be named Melin de Saint Gelais; his aspect shall be sweet, simple, lively; and his profession shall oblige him to a particular modesty. Yet his humour shall be naturally inclin'd to a kind of raillery not very scrupulous: he shall have an ingenious and quick mind, and so near a subtilty that way, that it shall not be possible to be foreseen, and oftentimes it shall not be known what he aims at, till he has done speaking.

Then behold Marat with a grave countenance; no doubt thou wouldst take him for a person that were not fit for any thing but to teach morality. Nevertheless, no wit shall ever be more sportful than his. There shall be always good sense in his most foolish raillery, and pleasant passages in his most grave discourses. He shall be entertain'd in the service of the King, under whom Melin shall live. His style shall be sprightly, caustic, natural, and diverting. This Poet shall have the honor to be imitated by all Poets that would be pleasant; and yet be always inimitable.

In the next place, behold the Prince of the French Poets; he shall be a goodly person of a handsome stature and aspect; he shall be call'd Ronsard; his descent shall be noble; he shall be highly esteem'd, and deserve it, in his own days; for he shall have a very great genius. He shall also be sufficiently learned; but being he shall be the first in France, that shall undertake to make handsome Verses, he shall not be able to give his Works the perfection necessary to assure him lasting praises. However, it shall always be known by some of his Hymns, that nature has been very liberal to him, and that he merited his reputation. His fortune shall not be bad, and he shall dye superior to poverty.

But now behold Belleau, who shall not be without merit; he shall be one of the most eminent of seven Poets of the same knot, who shall be call'd the Pleiades, after the example of those among the Greeks. It shall be said of him, that he built himself a Tomb of precious stones, because in imitation of a Greek Poet, he shall write upon that subject. He shall one day translate the Odes of Anacreon, but he shall deprive them of a great part of their graces.

But if I please (interrupted Anacreon smiling) I can spoil the truth of Calliopes's prediction; for I need only burn all my Odes, to hinder that pretended Belleau from translating them to their disadvantage. By no means (answer'd Amilcar) for there was never any Poet that sacrific'd a handsome composition after he had made it. Since 'tis so (reply'd he) proceed then to read, and let him translate me as he pleases. And accordingly, Amilcar went on in this manner.

See next a Poet of quality; he shall be named Bellay; he shall compose very lofty and elegant Verses, and especially Sonnets upon the subject of Rome, which shall give him much reputation in his days:

After him, behold Jodelle, Cretin, Passerat, Olivier, and de Magny; all these Poets shall be sufficiently esteem'd during their lives: but their Works favoring of the infancy of the French Poetry, ought not to be nam'd to thee.

Behold,

Behold, next, the French Poet that shall make Tragedies with any reputation: his name shall be Garnier, and he shall be of a considerable lineage.

But dost thou see there a Poet with a very agreeable aspect? he shall be call'd Desportes, and shall aspire to be the most amorous of all the French Poets. Indeed he shall have a very sweet and passionate stile in his time; he also shall have the happiness to live in a Court, where Princes shall delight in ingenious Productions, and be inclin'd to magnificence. By which means he shall become sufficiently rich, much esteem'd by all the Grandeess, and much in favour with Women of quality.

Then consider a man of great Dignity in France; he shall be named Perron; he shall learn all the Sciences of himself; he shall be interess'd in the most important affairs of Europe, and be highly esteem'd. He shall have a great affection for Poetry, and notwithstanding his great employments, shall not cease to busie himself very frequently in making Verses, but his multiplicity of affairs shall hinder him from composing any considerable number.

Behold, next, an excellent Poet, who shall live at the same time; his name shall be Breant; Fortune also shall be favourable to his merit: he shall be endued both with virtue and probity: his Verses shall be full of Wit and Love, and there shall be some so excellent in his Works, that there shall never be any French Poet so famous, but would wish to have been the Author of them. He shall be of considerable degree in his Countrey; his aspect shall be sweet and agreeable, and shall be at that time, the most amorous Poet of France, though Desportes, whom I shew'd thee, will dispute that title with him: He shall be accus'd of not knowing when to make an end in some places, and to be something harsh in some others. But, to conclude, he shall be good amongst the good of his own times, and shall see none above him.

After him, look upon that man carelessly and unsutably attir'd: his name shall be Regnier; he shall be Nephew to Desportes, and deserve very much glory. He shall be the first that shall compose Satyrs in French; and though he cast an eye upon some famous Originals amongst those that preceded him, yet himself shall be an Original in his time; his compositions shall be excellent, and the meanest of them shall always have life and quickness. He shall paint out vices to the life, and the vicious very pleasantly; lastly, he shall read in a peculiar way among the Poets of his age, in which those that would follow him, shall frequently be subject to erre.

Consider, next a Poet, whose genius shall be great, and stile sublime; he shall have both vigor and boldness, and shall deserve to be translated into Latine and Italian. His name shall be Du Bartas, and he shall affect only high arguments. But for that the French Language shall not as then have attain'd to all its perfection, his Works shall soon after seem to have something antiquated in the stile. After this, redouble thy attention, and behold with pleasure a man who shall have the honor to have alter'd the Language of his Countrey, and brought French Poetry to such perfection, that he shall be the pattern of all the eminent Poets that shall follow him, and be alledg'd as an authority by all those of his own Nation. He shall be nam'd Malherbe, and shall be of a very honorable lineage, but so disfavoured by fortune, that he shall always be unhappy. 'Tis he that shall perfectly conceive the Idæa of excellent French Poetry, and find out the art of making the same Verses both stately and natural, majestick and sweet, harmonious and exact. He shall not appear to have more wit than another, but the handsomness of his expressions, shall advance him above all. Yet he shall have no delicate Soul in respect of Love, though there will be exquisite wit in his Verses. But in brief, he shall be universally acknowledg'd worthy of all the praises due to excellent Poetry, and so shall be generally extoll'd by all the World, though himself be design'd scarce ever to praise the Works of any.

Next, observe that black and swarthy man; he shall be named Theophile; his destiny shall not be happy; he shall come into the World with a great genius for Verse; his fancy shall be quick and confident; and if his judgement could retain his impetuosity, and correct the imperfections of his versifying, he would be Author of admirable compositions; but this he shall not be able to do, and all the good inventions of his mind shall be like Gold in the Mine, which is seen always mingled with earth and dust.

After him, behold Montfaron and De Lingender, two Poets, who shall deserve well: the first shall have a handsome faculty in his conceits and expressions, and the second an amorous, and passionate strain in his Verses, which shall please all those that have tender hearts.

But now prepare thy self to see an Illustrious Protector of Poetry, who shall be one of the greatest men of the World: Dost thou see him that holds the Ocean fetter'd, whom victory waits upon, and glory accompanies? 'tis the famous Armand, who shall be renown'd in all histories; his birth shall be very illustrious, the grandeur of his mind shall surpass the extent of all imagination; his heart shall be incomparably greater than his fortune, and yet his fortune shall be so high, that his resolutions shall make the destiny of all Europe. He shall be faithful to his Master, dreadful to the enemies of his Countrey, Victor over all those he shall encounter with, and the grand Protector of Virtue and the Muses. I shall say nothing of his victories, nor of all his virtues; for it would require too much time; but thou shalt only know that that Heroe of the latter ages, in the midst of his great affairs, and in the heat of War, which shall involve almost all the Universe, shall afford us a Sanctuary under him; and my Companions and I shall find a Mecenas in him, and almost the age of Augustus in the Court of France. For that he will not take much time for the Kings service to employ in composing many Verses, he will at least take care for the protection of those that shall; and by that means cause his pleasures to be placed in the rank of his virtues. For he shall give so favourable reception to all persons of worth, that he shall revive all Sciences and excellent Arts. Then shall Musick, Architecture, Poetry, and especially Comedies, resume new lustre; and even all handsome compositions made after his death, shall be look'd upon as caus'd by his influence,

Yet

Yet after him we shall have Protectors in France, and amongst others, there shall be a person in a principal office of State, who shall sometimes hear us favourably by the side of his Fountains. He shall have a very great capacity for all grand affairs, he shall dispatch the most difficult matters without enforcement, and perform most noble actions without vanity; he shall have a lively and piercing mind, and unparallel'd modesty, gravity, goodness, justice and probity; he shall never be false to his word, or his friends; whereby he shall be particularly reverenc'd by all persons that are endu'd with Virtue; and my companions and I will inspire all the Poets of his time, who shall not be few, with the desire of singing his glory. He that should go about to reckon up all the famous Works that shall be made from the time the great Armand shall have favour'd us to the end of that age, shall find the number almost infinite; for never shall there be seen so many great and sublime Heroick Poems, handsome Comedies, charming Eclogues, ingenious Stanza's, elegant Sonnets, agreeable Epigrams, pleasant Madrigals, and amorous Elegies.

But to do thee a considerable favour, behold that Woman who appears to thee; she hath, as thou seest, the resemblance of Pallas; and there is something so sweet, languishing, and passionate in her beauty, that it perfectly represents that charming air which Painters give to Venus. This illustrious person shall be of so noble a descent, that she shall scarce see any but Royal Families above her own: But to speak only concerning her self, know that she shall come into the World with a more admirable mind than beauty; though as thou seest, she shall be Mistress of a thousand charms. She shall also have a generous goodness, that shall render her worthy of high commendations; but to omit so many other surprizing qualities as Heaven shall confer upon her, know, she shall compose Elegies, so handsome, so full of passion, and so exactly accomplish'd in all that is requir'd to the perfection of such compositions, that she shall surpass all those that preceded her, and all that shall attempt to follow her.

In the same times shall be sung a thousand exquisite Sonnets in France, which shall pleasantly comprise all the Morality of Love; and it shall be principally in this age, that a particular way of gallant and pleasant kind of Poetry shall be in use, wherein Love, Praises, and Raillery shall be mingled together: but that raillery shall be in the most delicate and ingenious manner: for there is a difference between causing divertisement, and causing laughter: Nevertheless there shall be several Poets, who shall confound the gallant and pleasant sort of Poetry with the Burlesque or Mocking, which the French shall receive from the Italians; although there is much difference in the way of composition of either. There shall likewise be several kinds of Burlesque Verses; the pleasantness of some of which shall consist in the inventions and conceits, and not in the style; Others shall not be truly Burlesque, saving in the expressions: and there shall be one sort so vulgar, mean, extravagant, and gross, and which shall make such unhandsome representations, that my companions and I shall almost eternally disown the Poets that shall be capable of it. Withal, there shall be a numerous Sect, who shall judge it fit to speak no otherwise than the people do, and to be pleasant with no other than vulgar conceits. Not but that 'tis possible to make Works of this kind with very much art, and I assure thee, some shall deserve to be commended and desir'd. But to speak reasonably, as there are few great Architects that attempt to build Palaces with Clay, so also few great Poets can design to make handsome compositions in a popular style. There shall also be other Burlesque Poets, who shall believe themselves sufficiently pleasant, provided they asperse the reputation or the Works of others, and who trusting to the malice of their Readers, shall not be so solicitous, as to seek to detract with Art, so that without affecting any particular style, they shall sometimes rise high, and sometimes fall low, according as the necessity of their Rhime, or the wildness of their Fancy leads them. But as for gallant and pleasant Poetry, it shall have more affinity with that of the Greeks, than of the Latins; it shall be noble, natural, easie, and agreeable; it shall sometime, deride innocently, it shall commend without much exaggeration, it shall reprove sometimes without sharpness, and shall be ingeniously sportful and recreative. It shall sometimes be soft and compassionate, and sometimes sprightly and cheerful; it shall likewise admit some small glances of Morality, delicately drawn; it shall sometimes be full of agreeable inventions, and ingenious fictions; Love and Wit shall be mingled together in it; it shall have a certain air in the World; that shall distinguish it from all the other sorts of Poetry; and lastly, it shall be the flower of their Wit, who shall be excellent therein. France shall have three or four Poets of this kind in the same age, which shall be admirable, though there will be considerable difference between them: On the other side there shall be during some time, such a multitude of Burlesque Poets, who shall cause no body to laugh, that nothing shall be made so great, as to exempt it from the burlesque of those persons: 'Tis true, in the same age, there shall be so many excellent persons of all conditions, that there shall be some ground of comfort against the multitude of mean Poets. But alas, I shall tell thee Hesiod, that I fear so many excellent pieces of Poetry will not find censors sufficiently equitable, and that that age so full of wit, will not

'Tis sufficient (Calliope interrupted Apollo, who appear'd to Hesiod with the rest of the Muses;) it is not fit a Mortal should know as much as we, and thou hast told him enough to raise up his mind, and to instruct him. Apollo having done speaking, and the Concert beginning again for some moments, Hesiod imagin'd Calliope gave him a wreath of Laurel, which she held in her hand. Upon which awaking suddenly, Apollo and the Muses dis-appear'd. In which instant he beheld a kind of light that dazzled his eyes, and rose up without knowing what he was going to do, having his mind so fill'd with what he thought he had seen and heard, that he was perfectly astonish'd; which he was likewise again, presently after he had something recollected himself, whereupon, beholding a fair and young person, about twelve or thirteen years old, follow'd by three or four Women, and two Men, who after they had descended from their Chariots, chariots, consider'd the native handsomness of this famous Fountain, by the side of which he had slept. Hesiod had never lov'd any to that time; but he had no sooner beheld this fair Virgin, than his heart was affected with the sight. At first he consider'd whether it were not one of the Muses that staid by the Fountains side; but this error was soon resolv'd; for he perceiv'd this person was come thither only out of curiosity, as many others us'd to do. He saluted her very civilly with the rest of her company, and was troubled for having been seen asleep: Not but that the former apparition of the Muses, did still sufficiently possess his mind, but the sight of this fair Virgin surpass'd all other imaginations; whereupon making use of the liberty taken by persons that are at such places, which people go to see out of curiosity, Hesiod approacht these Ladies, and handsomly addressing to them. May not I render a civility (said he) to such fair strangers in informing them at least of some particularities of a place they come to see? We have so little time to be here (answer'd Clymene) that it will certainly be very advantageous to us, if you, being, as probably it seems, one of the Countrey, please to instruct us a little better concerning this famous fountain, the pleasantness of whose water seem'd to invite me to drink of it immediately upon my arrival. But they tell me (added she smiling) 'tis the fountain of Hippocrene, and if I take not heed, I shall not be able to hinder my self from making Verses. And being not assur'd to have so good a faculty as Sappho, I am in a strange perplexity; for there is nothing in the world I should more hate to make ill, than Verses. You speak so agreeably what you intend (answer'd Hesiod) that I believe you will always admirably accomplish what you design to make. But as for my part (added he, smiling) though I dwell sufficiently near this fountain, yet I dare assure you, that your eyes are more powerful to make a versifier, than the fountain which I see; for I have walk'd a hundred times upon its banks, without having had the least temptation to compose verses; and nevertheless within a moment that I have had the honor to see you, I find a strange desire in my self, of being able to tell you, as well in Verse as in prose, that I have never beheld any person so transcendently fair, as you. Clymene blusht at the flattery of Hesiod, who by that means conceiving her more lovely than before, enforc'd himself to speak to her again. Whereupon, the rest of their company mingling in their conversation, they continued above an hour in that place; after which, they all went together to the City, which bare the name of the famous Mountain, consecrated to the Muses; for this fair company came to see the Festival of Cupid, which was to be celebrated. Now Hesiod being a person of much civility, and highly taken with Clymene, he took all imaginable care for her convenience, in seeing the solemnity of this Festival. But it was remarkable, that having never before thought of composing Verses, he notwithstanding made some before he went to his rest that night, and could not hinder himself from it; so that he knew not whether it was the Muses that had inspir'd him, or the fair eyes of Clymene; for the commendation of them was his inducement to the undertaking. In the mean time he understood Clymene was a person of quality of the City of Locri, whose fortune was not very happy, because she was not very rich. He likewise contracted familiarity with one of her brothers, who was then with her, and whose name was Amiphanes. While the Festival of Cupid lasted, he was inseparable from this agreeable company, and compos'd several pieces of Courtship in Verse, with a facility himself was astonisht at, not knowing, as I said, whether the Muses had inspir'd him, or the beauty of Clymene unloos'd his wit. The departure of this fair Virgin, after having afflicted him for some dayes, occasion'd his making of more Verses. But being of an age which easily admits consolation of any thing, his grief did not torment him long. 'Tis true, the applauses which all the World gave to his Verses, contributed much to comfort him, for Glory is a Mistress, whose first favors are always sweet. Whereupon he addicted himself wholly to Poetry, and really acted as if he had been inspir'd; for he studied with such speed, that in very little time several Works of his were seen upon divers subjects, which requir'd different sorts of knowledge; whereby it came to be reported over all Greece, that in a moment the Muses had taught him all the Sciences. He writ a Tract concerning Agriculture, which he address'd to his Brother; he made another of Astrology; he celebrated several Heroes, and Heroesses of antiquity, and spoke much more to the advantage of Women than of Men, to be contrary to the custom of Homer, who had more highly extoll'd Men than Women, relating several examples of illustrious and virtuous Women, which had consented to marry with worthy Men, for their virtue only. Moreover, he made the Epithalamium of Peleus and Thetis; a lamentation upon the death of Batrachus, and a Work which he call'd The Shield of Hercules; at the same time also he began that which he call'd Theogonia, in which he speaks of the original of the gods; he discours'd likewise concerning the art of Physick and Divination; and which is remarkable, having in one of these Works, introduc'd a Nightingale and a Hawk speaking together, he gave the first pattern of those ingenious Fables of Brutes, whereby Aesop afterwards render'd himself so famous. So that having acquir'd a high reputation by this great number of Works, which he compos'd in the space of five or six years, his heart no longer appear'd sensible to any thing but glory and ambition. Then he made several voyages with very much pleasure; because into what place soever he went, his reputation out-stripping him, he found friends every where. But that which caus'd him to be most spoken of, was the advantage he got over Homer, by the judgement of Panis King of Chalcis; for having both made Verses at the celebration of the funerals of Amphidamus, Hesiod was declared Victor; and for having explicated a Riddle, which Homer was unable to do, he obtain'd a Tripod of Gold, which he consecrated to the Muses. Indeed the judgement of Panis was not approv'd by all the World; for the siders with Homer, and the enemies of Hesiod, when they observ'd some person to judge unsutably of any thing, took up a by-word in derision, saying, That it was a judgement of Panis: But however, Hesiod having obtain'd the prize, and plac'd it in the Temple

ple of Delphos, with an Inscription, that signified the glory which he had gained, the advantage remained wholly on his side, and the Victor of him that had overcome all others, could not fail to be glorious. Ambition thus possessing the heart of Hesiod, he studied only to preserve the glory, which he had gotten, and that in such a manner, as it might prove beneficial to his Fortune. To which end at his return from Chalcis, he consulted the Oracle concerning the conduct of his life, which answered him, that he ought carefully to avoid the Temple of Jupiter Nemaus; for which reason he removed far from Peloponnesus, where that famed Temple stands. His Father being dead some days before, and having his estate at his own disposing, he resolved to go to the Court of the Prince of Locri, who was reputed a Lover of Verses. Indeed, it seems the Locrians are more obliged than others to esteem Verses, and those which make them; for the famous Mountain of Parnassus divides their Country. The Opuntines call the Locrians Orientals, and on the contrary, the Osolians count the Locrians Occidentals; the first bear in their Ensignes Aurora, as it uses to be painted, and the other the Evening Star. Now Hesiod having chosen the Court of the Prince of Locri, as a Court wherein ingenious persons might advance their fortunes more than elsewhere, and wherein he might have some knowledge since his having seen Clymene, Antiphanes, and the rest of their company at Helicon, took his journey thither, though without having at that time, any sentiment of that beginning Love he had had at eighteen years of age, for a Virgin of thirteen. Another thing which obliged him the more to go thither, was that he was informed the Prince of Locri had a Favorite, who as well as the Prince his Master, delighted to render justice to merit. There was also another reason induced him to make choice of that place; for the chief Priest of Helicon had a Niece married at Locri, to a man of quality, who was in no mean respect with the Prince's Favorite whose name was Lyfcrates. Hesiod then went to Locri, and was entertained at the house of the Niece of that chief Priest of Helicon, who was named Belintha, and her Husband Artemides. As soon as he was there, he enquired tidings of the fair Clymene, to whom Belintha was an intimate friend. This Woman who was very amiable and sprightly, answered him sighing, that Clymene was in the Countrey, that she preferred solitude before conversation, that she had bid adieu to the world, and would return to the City, till the rigor of the winter should drive her thither. But Clymene (answered Hesiod much surprised) cannot in my opinion be above 19 or 20 years old, which is not an age in which to prefer solitude before the Court, unless she have lost her beauty by some accident. I assure you (replied Belintha) that Clymene is as fair as ever she was; and though she were less, yet she has so great a Wit, that she would be always infinitely amiable. It must needs be then, (said Hesiod) that this fair Virgin be possessed with some great discontent, which causes her to hate the World; but however, (added he) she will at least admit of a visit. By no means (answered Belintha) and unless Antiphanes or Ganctor, who are her brothers, carry you thither, I think I dare not do it; for she hates men principally. Then some one perhaps has betrayed her (said Hesiod.) Since several have loved her (answered Belintha smiling) it is no wonder if some of them have deceived her. Oh, I beseech you (replied Hesiod) tell me a little more exactly what has befallen Clymene, You shall know soon enough (answered Belintha) but nothing at present from me, Nor did Hesiod know more concerning her at that time: And moreover, ambition predominating in his heart, he was more solicitous of getting an interest with the Prince of Locri and Lyfcrates, then learning tidings of Clymene, Accordingly he succeeded happily in the design he had made, and in very few days became highly in favor with the Prince and Lyfcrates, and consequently with all the Court; for 'tis the custom for those who are favorably respected by Princes or men in government, to be so likewise by all the rest of the world. Thus ambition feeding it self with hope in the heart of Hesiod, he considered only how to make this beginning of favor become profitable to him, and thought no more of going to seek Clymene, in the Countrey, nor informing himself particularly of what had hapned to her. Yet he contracted a great friendship with Antiphanes and Ganctor her Brothers; but being it was not of them that he could learn the adventures of their Sister, he knew nothing of them then, but employed himself wholly in the care of his fortune, without feeling in his heart any inclination to love any fair one. He had without doubt a very respectful friendship for Belintha, and Belintha a very tender one for him; but it was absolutely without courtship. At that time the fair Clymene was with an Aunt of hers in the Country, without having any other consolation in her melancholly, than that which she received from the Letters of her dear Belintha, who us'd all means she could to cure her of her discontent. Hesiod lodging at the house of Artemides, had very much freedom with her, and went into her Chamber, and her Cabinet also, though she were not there. And going one day into her Chamber, whilst Belintha was there, he beheld an opened letter lying upon the Table, and though he was very discreet and respected Belintha enough, no to pry into her secrets, farther than she was willing, yet he could not contain from casting his eyes on this Letter, which he perceived was written by a Woman. But that which augmented his curiosity was, that he presently espied his own name in it, which farther instigating him to read it, he took it up, and found it written in these words,

Vuu

CLYMENE to her dear BELINTHA.

I Am very glad you have found an agreeable Friend, who comforts you for the loss of a faithful one, but though the merit of Hesiode be not unknown to me, yet I leave you to possess his friendship without envy; for I have so bad an opinion of the hearts of all men, that I can never be capable of confiding in any. But my dear Belintha take heed to your self, I conjure you; Love sometimes disguises it self in Friendship, and persons are often in love without thinking of it. You know you understood better than I the sentiments I had for the perfidious. — Be wise by my example, fear the merit of Hesiode, and distrust your self; for certainly if I had not been confident of my self, I had never been deceived by him that has forsaken me for Fortune, which will infallibly one day forsake him. Adieu, my dear Belintha; I have not the power to beseech you not to love me more, although it would be almost necessary for my contentment it were so, for I have no regret in my solitude but for you.

As Hesiode had done reading this Letter, Belintha entred and saw it in his hand; so that having unwittingly left it there, she was sorry for it, and blamed Hesiode for his curiosity; but he desired her pardon for it in so handsome terms, and told her so ingenuously how it came about, that she did not stick to pardon him, on condition, he would not let any person know of his having seen the letter! However, (added she smiling) you may believe, if you please, that I shall never have need of Clymene's counsel, and that without it I have so bad an opinion of men, in reference to Love, that were you as much my Lover as you are my Friend, and I might comply with you innocently, yet I would never engage my self to Love; for in truth, after what has befallen Clymene, no trust is to be given to any thing. But Madam (answered Hesiode) do you think I can have seen this Letter of Clymene, and not desire to know her adventures? I confess the curiosity I had to that purpose, was extinguished, but the sight of this Letter has so revived it in my mind, that I can live no longer without knowing them. Sincerely, (added he) I believe there is some kind of enchantment in this Letter: for as soon as I beheld my name writ in it, my heart began to beat; and now I have read it, I have a jealous curiosity to know who it is Clymene complains of, and I hate him before I know him. Yet you are very obsequious to him, (answered Belintha) Is it the Prince, (demanded Hesiode?) No, (answered Belintha) but 'tis Lysicrates. How? (replied he) is Lysicrates the man Clymene complains of? Yes (answered Belintha) and she has reason to accuse him. I beseech you Madam, (replied Hesiode) tell me all you know concerning Clymene; for she returns again into my fancy, such as I saw her upon the Bank of the Fountain Hippocrene. Although I know nothing which is not glorious to Clymene, (answered Belintha) yet if I tell you all that I know concerning her, I require that you never speak of it to any person whatsoever. If you require no more (replied Hesiode) you may please to begin, for I am of opinion, that nothing ought to be kept more inviolably, than a secret intrusted to us, though we should not apprehend that what is told us, ought to be concealed. After this, Belintha caused Hesiode to enter into her Cabinet, and having given order for none to interrupt them, began to speak in this manner.

Since your self have seen Clymene, I shall omit to say any thing concerning her person, saving that as wit advances the esteem of beauty, Clymene is infinitely more amiable than she was when you saw her, because she has a wit, than which none can be more elegant, natural, fit for ingenious things and divertising, and the most charming humor in the World. As for Lysicrates you know his birth is very noble; nor are you ignorant that he is a comely person, and has wit and worth; but however, it may be said you do not know Lysicrates. For before he came to be the Prince's Favorite, he was a thousand times more affectionate to his Friends of both Sexes, for as you know, a man cannot be Fortunes and his own; and has power no longer to give himself to another, when he has no more a right over himself. Now Lysicrates, being infinitely more agreeable than you see him, beheld the fair Clymene, the first time she appeared in the World; and had so strong an inclination for her, and she for him, that the very first day they became friends with a belief, that that kindness would last as long as their Lives. Not that Clymene was yet come to an age, in which she might probably know what friendship was, but having a very forward wit, a tender heart, sensible mind, and sweet nature, she ceased to act like a child, before she ceased to be so. But for that there is something in Clymene's deportment, which inspires awfulness and respect, she being serious and discreet, Lysicrates was a sufficient long time before he dared to speak to her otherwise than as an agreeable Friend. In the mean while, to tell you the truth of things, they were the happier thereby; for the Aunt of Clymene not imagining that Lysicrates was amorous of her Niece, permitted him to speak to her as much as he pleased; and Clymene being averse to imagine that the kindness of Lysicrates proceeded from Love, lived with him with all the confidence and liberty, that a dear familiarity was capable to give. If there was any little news which was not to be told aloud, they whispered it to one another; if any uncouth adventure hapned, they spoke sincerely what they thought of it, if any excellent Sonnet were made, Lysicrates gave it to Clymene, or Clymene to Lysicrates; and thus there being a society of pleasures and little secrets between them, they led a very pleasant life. Clymene without doubt had no great wealth; but being without ambition, she was not therefore unhappy. As for Lysicrates, he was more rich than she, and seemed to be content with his Fortune, and to desire nothing else else but to be loved by Clymene. In what place soever Lyfcrates heard his Mistress spoken of, he heard of her praises; and in what ever place Clymene heard her Love mentioned, she was obliged to rejoyce, for the glory he had in being commended by all the World. Now Clymene being very ingenious, disengaged her self as much as she could from the multitude of visits, and confined her self to a little society infinitely agreeable, because it consisted only of very worthy persons. Lyfcrates for his part, delighted in no place; saving where Clymene was, he attended the Prince only out of duty, and pleased himself with none but the Friends of Clymene. So long as the fair weather lasted, we walkt continually together in all the pleasant places about the City; for Clymene's humor and mine; having great resemblance, we were much pleas'd with walking. Lyfcrates also had the same inclination. But though these two persons had then a very tender passion one for another, yet Clymene would not think it was Love that was in her heart; because having only innocent thoughts, she would believe she had only a friendship for Lyfcrates. But on the contrary, I maintained boldly, she had something more than she imagined; and I remember one day amongst the rest, speaking to her of her affection for Lyfcrates; I cunningly urged, that if it were no more but friendship, that which she had for me would have prepossessed her mind enough, to hinder her from having such a dearness for him. I confess to you sincerely, (said I to her) I cannot comprehend why the friendship you bear to me, has not defended your heart against Lyfcrates; for you say, you will not have him ever pretend to obtain any thing of you, and that you will only eternally love and be loved. I acknowledge it, (said Clymene.) Why then (replied I) are you not contented with my affection? You know I have been a Lover in our friendship, (if I may so speak) I was the first that sought to please you, I have had a thousand and a thousand little cares to divert you, you have always been Mistress of my will, you have reigned in a sovereign manner in my heart, you have known all my secrets, and have trusted me with all yours. Alas! my dear Belintha (answered Clymene blushing) when two such friends as we affect one another, without Love, they have not many secrets which are agreeable either to relate to hear. But yet, (replied I) you were not formerly weary of me, a trifle diverted you, we spoke a thousand innocent follies, which we would not speak even to a Lover. I agree with you, (answered Clymene) but on the other side, a Lover tells me a thousand agreeable blandishments, which a female Friend cannot. Yet there are not many Friends of our Sex more flattering than I, (added I,) for I scarce ever see you without commending you; sometimes I say you have a rare complexion, sparkling eyes, and a cheerful humor, and at other times I commend your stature; nor do I think Lyfcrates extols you more than I. So that requiring nothing but esteem, dearness, care, and obedience, and not pretending that your affection for Lyfcrates should ever satisfy the least of his desires, I see not (said I) why you are not contented with my friendship, who have all the love for you, you can challenge, and have this advantage, that it does not expose you to detracti-

on. Ah cruel friend, that you are! (cried Clymene) you take pleasure to insult over an unhappy person. I do so at least (answered I) in convincing you of your insincerity; for you ought to confess that you love Lyfcrates; as all virtuous Mistresses do their servants; and that in very truth, you give hope to him that has touched your heart. I confess (replied she) I wish he would hope; but I declare to you withall, that I should be infinitely troubled, if I could reproach my self for having given him just cause to hope. You speak after so strange a manner, (said I,) that I doubt not but at length you will come to love Lyfcrates; till you become unhappy by him, and perhaps less loved. That would be hard Fortune, (answered this lovely Virgin) if one should destroy the ardor of a Lover, by giving him tokens of affection, and he must needs have an ingrateful heart, and an ill-natured mind. But my dear Belintha, (added she) fear not that unhappiness to me, for I shall never love Lyfcrates too much. I wish it, (said I to her) for your contentment, because I am perswaded the best Friends are the most dangerous Lovers, and that all men in general are to be feared. But how confident soever Clymene was of not loving Lyfcrates too much, yet she came by degrees to love him with a dearness which caused all her discontent and all her happiness. However, notwithstanding the affection she had for him, her Virtue continued immovable. She suffered him at length to speak to her of his passion, and gave him several innocent testimonies of her own, but Reason and Virtue were always Mistresses in her heart. That which was remarkable in this adventure, was, that in the beginning of Lyfcrates love, he offered Clymene several times to marry her, without the consent of his Parents, who by reason of the small fortune of this fair Virgin, would never have approved the match, but she having a great and generous heart, opposed the thing she desired; and told Lyfcrates that if Fortune did nothing considerable for her, she judged she ought not to marry him, for fear of rendering him unhappy. For as for my part, (added she) according to the sentiments of my heart, I should account my self happy in a Cottage, provided you were contented there. But since I ought not to believe you can regulate your ambition, as I could mine, I must refuse that which I desire, and resolve rather to be always unhappy, than to expose you to repent your self of having sacrificed your Fortune to your Love. How? Madam (answered Lyfcrates) can you believe it possible for me to change the sentiments I have for you? and that my Soul is so devoted to interest, as to esteem my self unhappy in a condition wherein you can be capable of contentment? No, no, you know not the heart of Lyfcrates, and you do him a strange injustice. For were it not that I fear, lest the height of my Fortune is not worthy of you, I would not leave you one moment in quiet. But to tell you the truth, I am so sensible in all that concerns you, that I should fear to become perfectly miserable, if I did not see you perfectly happy. Therefore my dear Clymene, (added he) it is requisite my Love make me ambitious, and I must loosen my self in some sort from you, in order to be conjoined inseparably to you, and go and make an interest with the Prince,

if possibly he may be so favorable to me as I imagine. I beseech you, Lyfcrates, (replied Clymene) tell me not you will become ambitious through Love, for these are too imperious passions, each of which require an intire heart, and who glory in destroying one the other by turns. If you ever discover that weakness in my heart, (answer'd he) take your affection from me, treat me as a Villain, and as a Traitor, more criminal than one unconstant. But moreover, Lyfcrates, (said she) you will attempt a harder matter than you imagine, which is to give bounds to Ambition. When men desire a thing, they do all they can to obtain it; when they have obtain'd it, they desire another greater, and imagine themselves nearer it than they were to that they obtain'd first. So that great employments evermore approaching, at the rate that favor increases, the desires are heightened, when one would think they ought to be satisfied. Thus all the passions uniting into one single one, it oftentimes happens, that Ambition extinguishes Love, weakens Friendship, changes all pleasures into one sole delight, and likewise in that manner changes the hearts of those that suffer themselves to be possess'd with it, that they are no longer to be known for the same persons, nor do they know those they did formerly; yea, they no longer know themselves. You speak this with a certain fierce and melancholly air (answer'd Lyfcrates, smiling) which would almost make me think, that you believe already, I forsake you to follow Fortune; and in the mean time, I have not yet so much as resolv'd to go and seek it. After this, he added a thousand sweetneses and blandishments, full of generosity, which pleas'd Clymene infinitely, who related them to me the next morning. And indeed, during some time, it was not possible to testify more love than Lyfcrates did to this discreet Virgin. He thought his visits never long enough, moments were as tedious as ages in all other places; but in her conversation, whole days seem'd to him but moments. He writ to her every day, and oftentimes more than once. When he could not see her, he sought out people with whom he might discourse concerning her: he was zealous, assiduous, punctual, and careful, to seek out even the least occasions to please her. Wherefore Clymene, as her ill-fate would have it, believing at that time, nothing could ever diminish so strong a passion, laid a foundation of eternal felicity, upon the Love of Lyfcrates, and so ingross'd all her joy in her affection, that she no longer cared for any other sort of divertisement. Lyfcrates having a house in the Countrey, very near that, where Clymene at present resides, she lik'd far more to be in the Countrey than in the City, provided Lyfcrates were her neighbor: on which occasion in the Songs he made for her, he sometimes nam'd her his Shepherdess, and sometimes Amaryllis; and she gave him the name of Thyrsis, in the answers she made to him; for Clymene, no doubt, makes good Verses, for one of her Sex, though she carefully conceals it, and makes no ostentation of being a Wit.

Thus liv'd these two persons, till there hapned to be a great Hunting made by that Prince of Locri, at which Lyfcrates was present, and seem'd so promising a person in the eyes of the Prince, that he talked with him a long while: and being well satisfied of his ingenuity, he made him a thousand Caresses, and commanded him to see him oftner than ordinary. I, who understood this from Artemides, went to congratulate with Clymene, who was very joyful for the honor the Prince had done to her. Lovers who was not less pleas'd to see Fortune prevent his endeavours. Yet he believ'd his joy proceeded only from the interest of his Love; so that he us'd a thousand obliging expressions to Clymene, when he came to entertain her in private. Some days after he was higher in his blandishments; for you must know, that after the day of the hunting, the Prince desir'd Lyfcrates to see him every day. Whereupon, all the Court looking upon him as a Favorite, many insinuated to be his Friends, and endeavour'd to testify more respect to Clymene; who being perfectly generous, counsell'd Lyfcrates to take as much time as he could, from his conversation with her, to bestow it upon his attendance with the Prince. However, remember (said she to him) that I claim your heart to be always mine, and presume the favors of Fortune will never be so pleasing to you, as those you receive from me. I also require (added she) that you do not design to go so far as Fortune will lead you; for generally she casts them down headlong who give up themselves wholly to her conduct. Resolve therefore to acquire as much Estate as is competent for an honest person of your condition to become happy, and no more; and do not endanger the loss of all to gain all; 'tis better generally to renounce a great fortune, and live in tranquility with an indifferent one, than to raise up envious to your self by your grandeur. 'Tis glorious to be envy'd for Virtue, but it is not always to be so for Riches which are gotten; for, to speak in general, all men so pertinaciously maintain what they possess, that when a man becomes extraordinary rich in a little time, people are apt to believe that he became so unjustly. Put bounds then to your ambition, my dear Lyfcrates; for if you do not, infallibly you will become both unjust and unhappy. I beseech you, my dear Clymene (answer'd he) do not suspect me to have a Soul sway'd only with interest; for I swear to you, the love I have for you, is the sole cause of the servitude wherein I engage my self; and unless you will be ungrateful, you must be accountable to me, for all the cares I shall have to please the Prince; you must pity me when I am with him, and believe I shall think only of you, and that 'tis you I shall serve in serving him; for unless you promise me this, I shall not be able to deprive my self of the joy of seeing you every moment, and dividing my self between my Master and my Mistress. Clymene hearing Lyfcrates speak with so much love, had her heart mov'd with it, and generously exhorted him, to constrain himself to see her more seldom, and yet to love her always. And accordingly Lyfcrates began to be ingratiated with the Prince, who gave him a considerable employment, fifteen days after this conversation. In this beginning, Lyfcrates had so much joy when he went to see Clymene, that he seem'd more amorous of her. He was so troubled when he was to part from her, he writ to her so frequently, and appear'd so careful to do civilities to all those he thought she lov'd, that she had great reason to be satisfy'd with him. Nevertheless less, she acted with a little more reservedness towards Lyfcrates; after he began to be in favour, being unwilling (she said) he should suspect her of doing him favours upon the account of interest. But the brothers of Clymene, whose hearts were not so noble as hers, were desirous that she would treat Lyfcrates with more dearness, out of a design they had to raise their fortunes by his means. Yet this discreet Virgin following her own reason, and not their ambition, liv'd, as I told you, with all imaginable prudence, though she had an infinite dearness in her heart for Lyfcrates. Whilst she reflected upon her own deportment, and that of Lyfcrates, she began to think it strange, he took no notice of her changing her treatment of him, and likewise took it ill, that in the augmentation of his favour, he no longer mention'd rendering their fortune one day inseparable, as he had done formerly. It seem'd to her, his discourse was more sparing than it had us'd to be, whereof complaining to be one day in the Countrey, whither she went for two days; Well, my dear Belintha (said she to me) do not you perceive that Lyfcrates makes little difficulty to dispense with seeing me almost at all, and does his duty so easily, that if he take no heed, he will soon fail in the first of all duties. But Lyfcrates (said I to her, according as I then believ'd) ceases to see you for some time, in order to seeing you all his life after in quiet. No, no, Belintha, (reply'd Clymene) do not deceive your self, the heart of Lyfcrates is already chang'd, and I am the most mistaken in the World, if ambition do not absolutely deprive me of him. That which most troubles me (added she, blushing) is, that I would certainly know whether they are the favours of fortune or mine, which hinder Lyfcrates from speaking to me sometimes, such things as might give me ground to think he believes it not impossible, but that we may one day live together. Lyfcrates's Soul (answer'd I) must needs be much devoted to his interest, if the alteration of his fortune change his heart; and he must be very destitute of reason, if he ceases to love because he is lov'd. Ah! Belintha (cry'd Clymene) men are much more unjust than you imagine, and their love more various than I believ'd. For indeed, to discover to you the bottom of my heart, Marriage in general frightens me; I find there is oftentimes much folly, or at least much boldness in resolving upon it; but though my reason make me know all the troublesome consequences of it; yet I confess to you, when it comes into my mind, that perhaps Lyfcrates would not marry me if I should be willing to it: indignation seizes me, and I have almost more desire to hate him, than if he had committed an infidelity against me; because in some occasions one may be unfaithful, without doing any act, and a Lover can scarce ever be unwilling to marry his Mistress when she desires it, unless it be upon some injurious motive. For is there any thing more extravagant than to think that the testimonies of dearness which you have given, should be effective against your self? Nevertheless 'tis true, that the injustice of men is so great, that after having a thousand times requested innocent favours from a person whom they love, if she comes at length after a thousand services, to grant the same to them, they oftentimes render their virtue suspected, and cause that in desiring her for a Mistress, they do not wish her for a Wife. Moreover, my dear Belintha, I do not conceive that two free persons can love one another perfectly; nor even wholly with innocence, if they have not at least the thought, that it is not impossible for them to become one day inseparable, and if they do not entertain themselves with the hopes of a thousand pleasures, whereof the sole consideration makes them pass hours and days agreeably. Perhaps (added she, sighing) if Lyfcrates should offer me to day to marry me, I should not marry him; for having a heart so great as I have, 'tis possible his great fortune might hinder me from it. But, to speak freely, I would, in order to my contentment, be assur'd of the power to become his Wife when I pleas'd. However, I tell you once again. Lyfcrates does not at present think of it; and I cannot conjecture, as I told you, whether they are the favours of fortune, or my own, that hinder him. But (said I to her) all the favours that you do him being innocent, you cannot accuse him of such a sentiment as you speak of. Did you well understand the injustice of men (answer'd she) you would speak otherwise, for do not love them, they forsake you; love them, they despise you, and in what manner soever you act with them, you are almost always deceiv'd. As Clymene was speaking thus, she receiv'd a Letter from Lyfcrates, wherein were only these words.

Lyfcrates to Clymene.

I Could not visit you yesterday, nor can I wait upon you to day; and I know not likewise, whether I shall have opportunity to see you to morrow: but I know well that I hold all time for lost, which I spend in absence from you.

Clymene, after she had read this Ticket, answer'd to it in these terms.

Clymene to Lyfcrates.

Tis very much that you remember you ever saw me, and do not forbid me to hope to see you again; for when people are taken up with affairs of profit at Court, 'tis very difficult to attend to any of pleasure in the Countrey.

Clymene seal'd up this Letter, and deliver'd it to him who brought that of Lyfcrates. In the mean time an urgent affair happening to Clymene's Aunt, which oblig'd hither; we arriv'd here in that very evening. Which being known to Lyfcrates, he came the next morning to the house of Clymene; but he was no sooner there, but he desir'd permission to read a packet of importance, which he had receiv'd by the way; and he read it accordingly with very much attention.

And

And that which was remarkable, was, that in going to close it up after he had read it, he let fall the Letter which Clymene had writ to him the day before, and which he had not yet open'd. He blush'd with shame as soon as he perceiv'd it, for he had forgotten to read it; but Clymene blusht with indignation when she observ'd it. So that perceiving he had not yet seen it, she took it, and breaking it open hastily, Believe me, Lyfcrates (said she to him) 'tis fit to write to you no longer any but Letters of affairs; for, as for those of friendship, you have no leisure to read them; and which is more disobliging to continue to write such to you, you have so little care of them, that they may easily be read by others. Lyfcrates endeavour'd to excuse himself with the multitude of affairs he had had; No doubt you have too many (answer'd Clymene roughly) and therefore 'tis fit I dispense with all the cares you have been accusom'd to take in reference to me; for though you have much fewer than formerly, yet I have robb'd you of some moments. 'Tis true, Madam, (reply'd he) I am less frequently with you, than I was at the time when I was not oblig'd to attend the Prince; but nevertheless I am there often enough, and no doubt, as often as I can. Ha! Lyfcrates (said she) when one thinks that he is long enough present with his Mistress, there wants not much, but that he will be weary of being with her at all; and therefore if you will credit me, give your self wholly to your Master, and take no further thought concerning me. Lyfcrates perceiving Clymene was in choller, was ashamed of what had happened, and address'd to her with so many gentle and sweet expressions, that he made his peace in some manner before he went away: for Clymene having a very great inclination towards him, lov'd him as greatly culpable as he appear'd. At that time there hapned some difference between the Oriental and Occidental Loerians, upon which, the Prince went to the War, whither Lyfcrates follow'd him, and perfectly gain'd his favour by the brave actions he perform'd. During this absence, he writ sufficiently often to Clymene, but they were rather Letters of News, than Love-Letters, and more related to what pass'd in the Army, than any thing else. Upon which, Clymenes mind was extremely incens'd; yet her indignation was really, only Love disguis'd; for she was as sensible of Lyfcrates's glory as of her own. 'Tis true, that which defend'd him in her heart, was, that she knew he believ'd he lov'd as dearly as heretofore, and did not take himself to be ambitious. At his return he went to see her as soon as he was arriv'd; but his visit was so short, that the sum of it was only to tell her, he would wait upon her as soon as he could. But his affairs multiplying as his favour increas'd, he had then so little time of which he could dispose, that it may be said, he had not leisure to love Clymene. Oftentimes when he was at her house, he spent half of the time he was there, in receiving several Messages and Letters, or else in answering them, after having requested her permission to that purpose. He was no longer the same Lyfcrates, who entertain'd her with agreeable discourses and blandishments, he was a restless ambitious person, who found himself happy in no place. Clymene was sensibly afflicted at it; but I can say, I never saw a more tender, nor yet more discreet grief than hers; for she conceal'd it so well, that I was the only confident of her discontents. One day she would have hid from me some Verses which she had made; but I having gotten them, she was necessitated to suffer me to keep them on condition I would not shew them:

I beseech you (interrupted Hesode) repeat to me the Verses of Clymene. I will (answer'd Belintha) provided you will never speak of them; for perhaps you will find them sufficiently amorous: I promise you all you please (reply'd he) provided you recite the Verses to me which I have so great a curiosity to hear. And accordingly Belintha having recollected them in her memory, recited these that follow, which Clymene made for the ambitious Lyfcrates.

*Sure you by amorous flames were ne'r posses't, Since mine (alas!) do so unhappy prove,
That fierce ambition drives me from your breast,
Slighting the charms of Innocence and Love.*

*Now new designs are follow'd, other cares,
And fresh desires; and your Inquietude
Is your delight, whilst tumults of affairs
Are priz'd above the peace of Solitude.*

*My charming Desart, which e'r long so sweet,
So lovely seem'd, is unattractive now,
My tenderest sighs no longer your delight:
'Tis Goddess Fortune now to whom you bow.*

*Her splendor you pursue, and humorous Laws Embrace, no longer now your own or mine;
Her beauty now your adoration draws:
Though, Thyrsis, know, her favours are not kind.*

*No choice she uses in her Gifts, no Love;
Oft-times, in one day her caresses cease;
To dearest friends she does unconstant prove,
Mocking Men's hopes with guileful promises.*

*She loves disorderous change, and wild confusion,
And basest flatterers for her Creatures takes;
Go then, Ungrateful, follow her delusion Which seldom Virtue but unhappy makes.*

*Pursue her still; to me no more address;
None but her favors let acceptance find.
'Tis shame to love a simple Shepherdess;
That thought sutes only with a vulgar mind.*

*Ambitious hearts a quiet life despise;
Fortune's the object of a Heroe's love.
Whilst in her hands all the World's treasure lies,
And Sea and Land alike her power do prove.*

*A hundred times she can you Victor make,
Yet has not the disposal of my heart;
That's in my pow'r, O gods! what is't I speak?
(Alas!) in speaking so, a sigh does from it part.*

Beholding

*Beholding you, a secret check of mind
Tells me, 'My heart no longer is my own;
Though it repines, and I can only find
The soothing of sweet words to appease its moan.*

*'T would be deluded; come, deceive it you,
Thyrsis, and to your Amaryllis swear,
That constant to your chains and ever true,
Her Rival Fortune you'll renounce for her,*

*Perhaps, this moment, in her eyes you'll see Wherewith to cure the most ambitious mind:
Perhaps, this moment, such fidelity,
Such ardent passion in her Soul you'll find,
That you'll account to be belov'd a pleasure
Greater than that of gaining fitting Treasure.*

*Oh precious moment! haste to ease my pains;
Your presence to my griefs would comfort speak,
I can no longer bear such heavy chains;
Support them, Thyrsis, or I shall them break,*

*But yet in breaking them I shall expire;
Rather connect them with a faster tie.
'Tis Love that quickens me; for were that fire
Extinguish'd, my heart would forthwith faint and die.
This torment I had rather ne'er forgo,
Than be without it and my Lover too.*

How? (cry'd Hesiod after Belintha had recited these Verses) did Clymene, that very Clymene, whom I saw by the side of the famous Spring near Helicon, make such amorous Verses as those I have now heard? Yes (answer'd Belintha) but although they were very pertinent to affect the heart of Lysicrates, yet the generous Clymene, who was unable to restrain her self from composing them in the transport of her sorrow and affection, could not resolve to let them be seen by him for whom they were made. On the contrary, she affected rather to disguise her regret: So that Lysicrates believing her well satisfi'd with him, was very merry, whilst she was extremely melancholly and pensive: for what resolutions soever she made, it was impossible for her to cease loving Lysicrates. How unhappy am I (said she to me one day, when I endeavour'd to comfort her) for I resent a grief of so strange a nature, that I cannot almost hope to be cur'd of it. If Lysicrates were unfaithful, as many Lovers are, and transferr'd his affections from me to another, despite would suddenly cure me; I should pass from Love to Hatred, and from that to contempt, which would afterwards leave me in a quiet indifference. But as for the manner after which he ceases to love me, they whose hearts are not very nice in love, would almost believe Lysicrates not absolutely culpable: But, according as I apprehend things, inconstancy would seem less horrible to me, than the change which is hapned in his heart, since the alteration of his fortune. There is frailty and weakness in ordinary inconstancy, but there is unworthiness and poorness of mind in the change of Lysicrates; but though I should dye of discontent, I will drive out of my heart a passion which is not criminal, but only because he that excited it is not worthy of it. Moreover, though he should be willing to return to me, he would not have leisure to think of it, he has so many important affairs in his head, which all the punctualities of a dear passion could not consist with. But (said I to her) why do not you change, as well as Lysicrates? Be ambitious as well as he; and without considering whether he loves you as much as he did heretofore, dissemble your sentiments, and engage him, at least to establish your fortunes, since he is able to do it. No, no, (answer'd this generous Virgin) I will never have any obligation to a man who loves me less than he ought, and whom I intend to love no longer. And though my fortune were much more unhappy than it is, I should be absolutely incapable to receive any thing from a person that had depriv'd me of his heart. I know my brothers are of a different opinion, and would have me sacrifice my self to their interests; but they shall never oblige me to follow their inclinations. When Lysicrates was not in favour, they condemn'd the affection I had for him; and now they think it necessary for their preferment; no doubt they will blame the manner, after which I intend to treat him for the future. However, I will continue firm in my resolution. But (said I to her) at least give Lysicrates to repent. I shall give him sufficient (answer'd she) for I find my heart will not so soon obey my reason. Accordingly Clymene continu'd to love Lysicrates in spite of her own resolutions; that which sustain'd her passion was, that Lysicrates some days spoke to her with as much love as ever he had done. Indeed it was sufficiently seldom that he discours'd with her in private, for he had always so many affairs, that he ever began to speak to her with these words, I have but one moment to spend with you, or two at most, I have not leisure to tell you any thing; or some such like expressions. Things being in these terms, there was a great assembly, wherein Clymene was oblig'd to be present; whereupon, desiring to appear handsome there, that Lysicrates might see she deserv'd his affection, she omitted no ornaments that might render her more amiable: And indeed, she out-shin'd the beauty of all the other fair ones, and so pleas'd the Prince that he spoke not to any Lady but Clymene; not but that the Prince had heard Lysicrates was amorous of her; but he beheld him so assiduously at Court, that he thought it was no very violent Love. Clymene who beheld the Prince's civility towards her, interpreted it at first as an indulgence to his Favorite; but at the end of the Ball, when he entertain'd her a part, she chang'd her opinion; for after having given her a thousand praises, I find you so charming (said he to her) that I cannot but wonder at the assiduous attendance of Lysicrates at Court; for had I such a Mistress as you, assuredly my Matter, if I had any, should be worse serv'd than I am by him. Clymene blush'd at the Prince's discourse, and answer'd to it with so much wit, that she seem'd to him still more fair. So, that having his fancy fill'd with the Idea of her he spoke of none but Clymene all the rest of the evening. He likewise spoke to Lysicrates concerning her, with earnestness; but in case (said he to him in the presence of a friend of Clymene's, who inform'd her of it the next morning) I should

maugre all my reluctancy, become amorous of your Mistress, and if you saw me ready to die for love, would you be generous enough to yield her to me, and not hate me? No doubt (answer'd the ambitious Lyfcrates) I should be very unhappy, if that should come to pass, but however, my Lord, (added he) it would be so great an honor to Clymene, that, her interest consider'd, together with the respect I have for you, I think I should resign her to you; and that your happiness, and that of this fair person, would comfort me for my infelicity. Lyfcrates spoke this with so free an air, that it was perceivable he spoke his real sentiments: whereupon the Prince, who till then had lookt upon the inclination he had for Clymene, as a thing he was to oppose, with the friendship he bare to Lyfcrates, now perceiving Clymene not so deeply fix'd in his heart as he imagin'd, flatter'd his beginning passion so sweetly, that having seen Clymene five or six times in a very few days, he became infinitely amorous of her; for he is a Prince whose passions are violent, during which he is not scrupulous of doing any thing to content them. In the mean time Clymene understanding what Lyfcrates had answer'd the Prince, became extreamly exasperated in her mind, though she dissembled her discontent. Indeed within a little time she had occasion to discover it; for the Prince's passion being grown too great to be kept in his own breast, he discover'd it to his Rival, before he made it known to his Mistress; but it was in such powerful terms, that Lyfcrates saw clearly he must either lose Clymene, or his fortune; wherefore not sticking a moment what choice to make in this difficulty, he told the Prince, he sacrific'd all his pleasures to him, that he would be his confident, and intercede with Clymene for him: And the truth is, Lyfcrates, who had always observ'd Clymene to have a very great mind, imagin'd the hope of marrying the Prince, would cause her to approve his action; not considering that sometimes there is more grandeur of courage in despising fortune, than in seeking it. Yet he did not absolutely resolve to renounce the affection of Clymene, but intended to make it serviceable to him, for the further augmenting of his greatness and wealth. In which thoughts he went to visit her when having desir'd a private conference with her, and seeming more sad than he was, he prepar'd her mind with much address to hear some unwelcome matter, which he seem'd to be very loth to tell her. Clymene immediately believ'd his business was to inform her, that the Prince intended to marry him to one of his Cousins, who was a very rich young Lady; but at length he told her the end of his visit was to acquaint her that his Master was his Rival; not but that (said he to her) I am generous enough to sacrifice all my joy to your good fortune; and after having been your slave, am willing to become your subject; for I doubt not but if you manage the Prince's love well, he will at length sufficiently affect you to make you his bride; but indeed I find it no easie matter for one to deprive himself of that which he loves, how generous soever he be. 'Tis true (added he) our affection has been always so innocent, that it might subsist all our lives: at least I know I shall be always a devoted servant to the fair Clymene, and no change shall ever happen in my heart: It shall not be so on my part (answer'd she hastily) for I declare to you, I will never be yours; however, think not 'tis out of any purpose to manage the Prince's love, as you speak. I hate ambition, which has driven me out of your heart, too much to receive it into my own, and you occasion me so to condemn all men in general, that I believe it not possible for me ever to esteem one particular person. Do not expect therefore that I should confirm your fortune; for all I can do, is only to contrive how to ruine it; and if any thing could induce me to admit of the Prince's love, it should be only the opportunity of bringing you into disfavor with him. But to speak truth, I look upon you as sufficiently punish'd, by being no longer in favor with me, and therefore I shall not seek a revenge which would fall upon my self; for in the sentiments I am in, I abhor the love of any whatsoever. I intend now to love nothing but solitude, and I hope to live more contentedly in it, than you will do at Court with all your favour; for where there is private satisfaction and pleasure, there needs not much care to be taken for the favor or disfavor of those that are in government: But to do you a good office this last time, know that all those who flatter you, deceive you, that they whom you take to be most your friends, are envious and disguised enemies, that all those who see you think themselves better entitled by desert to the Prince's favor, than you; that as soon as you are turn'd out of favor, you will find your self left alone by all your party, and that there was only Clymene in the World, that could not desert you in adversity. But since you forsok her as soon as you were a favorite, she takes her turn to abandon you, and casts you off for ever. Therefore hinder the Prince from coming to speak to me of his pretended passion; for looking upon him as a man that loves one whom I ought to hate, it would be difficult for me to preserve the respect which I owe unto his quality. Lyfcrates hereupon offered to swear to Clymene, that he was sorry his Master was his Rival, that he had not spoke to him as he did, but only not to incense his passion; and that as for her, since she was sufficiently generous, not to be flatter'd with the hope of marrying the Prince, he desir'd nothing of her, but to act with such address, that he might be cur'd of his passion, without occasioning a breach between them. Whereby Clymene always perceiving his Ambition superior to his Love, became so incens'd, that she absolutely commanded him to depart; which accordingly he was enforc'd to do. Not long after which, I went to give her a visit, and I assure you I never beheld a person more discontented and enraged. As it fell out cruelly for her, the Prince came to see her the same day; when being still disturb'd in mind, she spoke to him with a resoluteness that surpriz'd him, for as soon as he began to tell her he lov'd her, and would love her eternally, I beseech you my Lord (said she to him) forbear to engage me in a design which can never give you any satisfaction. For though I appear gentle and am so really, yet I have an inexpugnable constancy to remain in the resolution which I have taken; by reason of which it would be impossible for you to perswade me, that I ought to admit of your affection. 'Tis enough that Fortune has plac'd you above me, to cause me me to suspect all your discourse ; and I am so much a friend to equality, that since you have advanc'd Lyfcrates, I can no longer look upon him as formerly. I love Merit and Virtue, but I love them principally without splendor, and without being set off by any thing else, which prepossesses my judgement ; Leave me therefore, my Lord, as a person who accounts it a glory to be an enemy to ambition : you will find a thousand who will love your fortune more than your worth, and receive that with joy which I refuse with respect. However, upon the account of equity, I am oblig'd to tell you, that Lyfcrates has spoken so well of you to me, that he has wholly ruin'd himself in my opinion. After which, my Lord, desire no more of me ; for it would be to no effect. Clymene spoke this with an air, that so wel manifested to the Prince that she lov'd Lyfcrates, was incapable of ambition, and could not love him, that his heart being not yet so strongly engag'd, but that he might hope to disengage it, he spoke to her with very much civility, and like a man that would owe nothing to his high condition. But at length, said he to her, after many other things, The favour which I request of you, is, that you will continue to love Lyfcrates ; or if you cannot do that, that you will permit me to hope, that perhaps you will one day love me. These two things which you demand, my Lord (answer'd she) are not in my power ; for I find that I shall hate Lyfcrates, and I see no appearance that I can or ought ever to love any. After this the Prince departed : The same night she intreated me to require of Lyfcrates, all the Letters she had written to him, and charg'd me to deliver to him all those she had receiv'd from him, and to assure him she contemn'd him as much as she had esteem'd him, and wish'd, with all her heart, she could as much hate him, as she had formerly lov'd him. But, my dear Clymene (said I to her) are you well assur'd that Lyfcrates will restore you your heart, when he gives you back your Letters ? go not so fast, I beseech you ? and take time to examine your self. Ah ! no, no, (answer'd she) I will never, while I live, love a man who loves Fortune better than me, who can love me without ever thinking to render our destiny inseparable, who can even sacrifice me to his Master, and be a confident to his Rival. The heart of Clymene is too tender, too sensible, and too generous, to suffer such indignities. I had much rather be always miserable ; the little wealth I have is an ordinary effect of the blindness of Fortune, which is not opprobrious to me ; but were I so poor-spirited, as to pardon Lyfcrates, it might be reproacht to me eternally. Clymene thus continuing firm in this resolution, oblig'd her Aunt, over whom she had a great influence, to go the next morning into the Countrey. For my part I went to Lyfcrates, in whom I found such a combat of contrary thoughts, that I could not but commiserate him ; for he lov'd Clymene still, but ambition was always most powerful in his heart ; and though he were still a Lover, yet it was not with his first ardor, and consequently Clymene could not be satisfy'd with it, because all diminution of Love is a crime. He made some difficulty to restore me her Letters, but at length he deliver'd them, and receiv'd his own. Since that time the Prince has chang'd his sentiments, and Lyfcrates has continu'd ambitious, and caus'd his Love to yield to another passion. Nevertheless he offer'd two or three times to do something for the Fortune of Clymene, but she generously refus'd him. So she has spent a whole year in the Countrey, busying her self sometimes in Reading, sometimes in Painting, and sometimes in Walking : She loves Gardens and Flowers, and and an universal sentiment of goodness causes her to divert her self with keeping Birds, and divers rare and domestick Animals, which afford amusement to her Melancholly. Yet she is come at length to have only an indifference for Lyfcrates, so that she is as fair as ever, and something more amiable ; for a little cast of melancholly, makes her countenance charming and sweet, that the sight of it cannot but ravish.

Your relation concerning Clymene (answer'd Hesiod) gives me extream contentment, and I shall have cause of complaint against you, unless you bring it some way to pass, that I may see her. Yet I am very sorry she hates ambition, for I confess to you, I am born naturally ambitious. My reason tells me, that ambition is the foundation of all great actions ; that without it there would be no Heroes, and scarce any eminent virtues ; but however, I absolutely contemn Lyfcrates, because I am not of opinion, that Love and Ambition, are two Passions incompatible. I conceive a man's love may make him ambitious, as in some cases he may become amorous through ambition : Had Lyfcrates been an ambitious person, honourably and worthily, he would have shared his fortune with the fair Clymene, and not changed his sentiments by changing his life. But in fine, (added he) I am resolv'd to see her, and though I should go to visit her alone, I will go and do it before three days be expir'd. Belintha making some difficulty to carry him to her, he went alone to see the charming Clymene. But it fell out, by chance, that Belintha was there the same day ; for it being a journey but of two hours, she frequently made visits to her, though she design'd no such matter in the morning. And Hesiod also desirous to make a secret to her of his design to see Clymene, till he should have executed it, acquainted her not at all with it. When he arriv'd at the place where Clymene was, her Aunt was gone to make a visit to some of her neighbors, and her self was seated amongst the Willows, upon the bank of a River, and was reading that Work of Hesiod, where he makes a Nightingale speak to a Sparrow. A Virgin that waited upon Clymene, was at work in making a collar of several sorts of Ribbons, wreathed together, for a very handsome Dog, which Clymene much affected, and which then lay negligently upon the bottom of her Robe, which by chance was stretcht upon the grass. At Hesiod's approach, Clymene's Dog rose up ; but instead of barking at the sight of him as a stranger, the pretty creature, by that instinct which makes brutes know those that love or hate them, went to fawn upon him, who answering his kindness, the first thing Clymene beheld, was Hesiod stroking her little Dog : for though it was a very long time since she had seen him, yet knowing that he was at Locris, she soon was ascertain'd it was he ; wherefore rising up, and advancing towards him very civilly, I think (said she to him smiling) this Animal, who is of a kind that was never accus'd of ingratilude, would help me by his carresses to acknowledge the pleasure you have given me this day by the Verses you have made, the reading of which has been so delightful to me, that I was reading them the third time, when you arrived. I am extremely proud (answered Hesiod) of being able to entertain you in your solitude, and I draw no unhappy preface, from seeing that an Animal you love, has already begun to love me. If Belintha were here, (replied Clymene) she would blame you for the complement you make me; for she so much decryes my too great affection towards brutes, that she would venture to maintain, you have a blind complacence which would pervert me. She had scarce spoke these words, but Belintha came thither, who having left her Chariot in the out-court, went to the place where it was told her Clymene was. You come very opportunely, (said this fair Virgin to her) to hinder Hesiod from being perplexed; but why did not you come together. For my part (answered Belintha) I knew nothing of Hesiod's journey, and he has made a secret of it to me. After your having had the cruelty (replied Hesiod) to refuse to bring me hither, I did not think I ought to tell you my design, for fear you should make use of the credit you have in this place to prevent my admission. In truth (said Belintha, obliging them to walk) you are to be blamed for coming to see Clymene, for she is the most unjust person in the World, in preferring her Desert before her friends. And moreover, (added she smiling) I am to advertize you, that with all your merit you shall never be so much loved by Clymene as that Dog which you see. Hesiod (answered this fair Virgin smiling) shall certainly not have so great a share in my carresses, but he has sufficient in my esteem to be satisfied, and I thank him for bringing in a Nightingale, and a Sparrow, speaking together in one of his Works; for 'tis assuredly a sign, that he is not in the error wherein you are, to the disadvantage of all Animals in the World, to whom you are so much an enemy, that you go about to take from them that little beam of light the gods have given them, which guides them so exactly in things that are profitable or delightful to them, and gives them this prerogative above men, that there is never any ingratitude in their hearts. Acknowledgment is found in those of Lyons, and no question would be too in those of Tygers, if they were gently us'd: carresses and benefits are never lost amongst the most savage Animals, but frequently amongst Men. Disimulation and deceit are scarce ever found amongst brutes, and if they have subtilty, 'tis only to avoid dangers, or seek wherewith to subsist. It seems (said Belintha with a low voice) one single ingrateful Man makes you judge all Animals acknowledging; but however (added she aloud) though Hesiod were of your opinion, I should not disclaim my own, nor hinder my self from decrying the inclination you have to love brutes. For that you may not mistake, (continued she speaking to Hesiod) you must know that if Clymene were even amorous of any one, she could not resolve to give him a beast which she loved; and if at any time you would be assured of her heart, desire her Dog of her, and you shall see whither it will not be more hard to obtain the one than the other. You speaking very excellently, (replied Clymene) in comparing my Heart and my Dog together; yet I am not offended at it, (added she) for they are both faithful and can love well. But are you not ashamed (said Belintha) to attribute Reason and Friendship to beasts? But do not you deceive your self, (said Clymene) when you will not know, that a little Bird, who makes its nest very proportionably, is more ingenious than a hundred dull Men whom I know, and that a poor Dog, who follows me every where, and moans when I forbid him, has more friendship than a Man who is obliged with nothing, and who injures all those whom he ought to serve. For my part (said Hesiod then) I confess I could willingly amuse my self in observing the Reason of Beasts, if it be fit so to term that Light which Nature has given them; and I am also sensible of their kindness. I have always observed (answered Clymene) that cruel Men hate Beasts, and usually good persons love them, or at least, cannot endure any hurt should be done them. But as for ambitious people, who are so satisfied with themselves, and cannot think but of great things, they take no care to observe the Nest of a Swallow, to admire the labor of Pismires, the singing of Nightingales, the love of Turtles, and the kindness of Dogs, nor to amuse and divert themselves innocently with the carresses of these poor Animals, whose felicity is so easily accomplished. For it suffices to that of my Dog, that he suffer not hunger, that he find a little Brook to drink at, that he lye upon the corner of my Robe, and that I make much of him. He comes not but when I will, he goes away when I please, he is silent when I think good; if I chide him, he does not remember it a moment after, and is not less ready to caress me. Judge therefore I beseech you, whither that person would not be happy, that should find another whose heart were so tractable. But however, (replied Belintha) I cannot suffer that that should be called Reason in Beasts, which is only a blind instinct, and makes them act whither they will or no. Ah! my dear Belintha, (answered Clymene) how noxious is the power of choice oftentimes unto us, and that supream Reason which arrogates so much to it self, and makes no account of instinct, but causes us to commit faults, against Virtue, and even against our own pleasures. 'Tis certain, (said Hesiod) that the power of choice occasions all the errors of Men, and that at least brutes have this advantage in their misery, that they precisely know every thing that is fit for them. Some avoid heat, and seek cold: others flee cold, and follow heat, without any variety in their kind: but as for men, though they are born and dye alike, and that considering them in themselves, it seems they have need only of the same things to be happy; yet it is certain, that their reason, which is various according to their different tempers, is oftentimes that which causes the happiness of one, and makes the infelicity of another, and they apprehend things so differently, that they agree neither in reference to the gods which they adore, nor the Laws which they follow, nor vices, nor virtues, nor even in their peculiar pleasures. 'Tis not so with Animals; that which is good to one Nightingale, is good to all the Nightingales of the World; all fierce beasts have need of Dens; all Neasts of Swallows are alike, there there is no different architecture in them, and every species of animals has an immutable reason that governs it (as I may so speak) which pleases and charms me: for amongst us every one makes himself a reason after his own mode, so that when we would find out true reason among so many different reasons, 'tis a very difficult task. You speak admirably well (answered Clymene) for a discreet man who flies the World, and an ambitious man who pursues it, may both have Wit indeed, however differently they reason. This proceeds (replied Belintha) for that men are as different amongst themselves as Animals are in their kinds, and there is oftentimes as great a dissimilitude between one man and another, as between a bird of prey and a Turtle, so that every one must reason according to himself, and not according to another.

But however, it must be acknowledged, that humane reason has something very noble and sublime in it, by attempting to raise its knowledge even to the Heavens, and to the Center of the Earth, and he that shall consider the infinite number of profitable and delightful Arts which men have invented, the great number of Sciences whereof they are capable, the wise Laws which they have made, the different Ornaments which they have brought into the World; will laugh at the Neasts of Swallows, the labour of Bees, and the Husbandry of Pismires. I confess (answered Hesiod) that the reason of men is worthy of admiration for its vast extent, that considering it in it self, that half-reason of animals is but obscurity in comparison; but to speak truth, the bad Use men make of it astonishes me, and causes the possession of so great a good to seem less advantageous to me, since 'tis so difficult to employ it aright. And on the contrary, beasts scarce ever make any bad use of that light which nature has given them. 'Tis true, (said Clymene) there was never any Honey, but what was sweet, nor Pismires which did not providently labour, nor Swallows which made Neasts after different manners. But it is not so with men; for they will not so much as build their Houses alike. There is many times folly in their buildings, when they make them too magnificent for their own condition. On the other side, beasts who can content themselves with things necessary, and can make and proportionate them to their own uses, ought to make men blush, whose reason cannot bound their desires, whose natural incapacity stands in need of instructors, experience, examples, and practice, for the knowledge of the least of those things which are necessary; whereas the most stupid of all animals have that within themselves which is sufficient for them, without intermeddling with that which does not belong to them. Bees and Butterflies take from flowers that which is convenient for their respective uses, without offering to oppose one another; they have not set limits to their Empire; all the Lillies and Roses of the Spring are to them in common; and men with that sublime reason which renders them Masters of the World, have established War in it by establishing the Laws which divide the Universe. They have brought all kind of Vices into it, by the many inventions subservient to pleasure; they have made all the

miserias which are in the World, by looking upon ambition as a lawful thing, since without it all men would be in peace; and in brief, they have introduced all the unhappineses of which they complain, although the gods have enriched the Universe wherewith to render them all happy. Who would think (interrupted Belintha smiling) that the love Clymene has for this poor little Dog which you see follows her, and understands nothing of what she says, should cause her to speak such handsome things, and that after so serious a manner? who could imagine, that a person who has so much Wit, should take pleasure in trifling with a Dog? I have already told you (answered Clymene) that the love of beasts is a sign of gentleness and humanity, and that it is cruelty to do them harm; but I add also, that all that loves is amiable, that all that insinuates it self with kindness, deserves to be ingratiated, that that which has no ingratitude deserves to be well treated, and that since it is not forbidden to love Flowers, Fountains, and Statues, it may well be lawful to love cheerful and pretty animals which love you, and divert you, without ever doing you any harm. But in brief, (replied Belintha) 'tis not our purpose to extoll the demy-reason of brutes, and condemn the use of the reason of men; but only to know whether Amity, which is the most precious thing in the World, and which ought to be the greatest recompence of the most considerable services, and the most noble prize of merit and virtue, ought to be employed in loving a little Dog. I am willing (added she) humanity should be exercis'd toward beasts, that no mischief be done them, and that people delight themselves with them if they please; but I would not have them loved with the same kindness wherewith we loved mankind, and which ought to be so precious, that it ought not to be given to friends, without well examining whether or no they be worthy of it. As for me (answered Clymene smiling) who have not found amongst men whereon to employ my affection conveniently, I must love where I can love without fearing to be deceived. 'Tis not (added she) that I grant I love my Dog with the same kindness wherewith I should love a Friend. But for that, all affections mankind is capable of, have the same original all arising out of the heart, Belintha is pleased to confound my kindness to brutes with my true friendship, and thereupon to inveigh against me without any just ground. The fair Clymene (said Hesiod) speaks her reasons so agreeably, that instead of condemning her, I wish I were not what I am, and had the honor to be hers in what manner soever. Endeavor then (answered Belintha) to be her friend if you can, and do not wish to be her Dog, for then I should infallably hate you. Ah! cruel Belintha (cried he with some earnestness) I believe it is difficult to be no more than the Friend of Clymene. Did you say, (answered that fair Virgin) it were no easie thing to gain my friendship, you would have reason; for contrary to my natural humor, I am become the most distrustful person in the World, and in my present sentiments I give no credit to words, nor cares, nor services; I know not well whether I should trust time, which they say discovers the most concealed truths. Therefore 'tis better to leave me in my Desert to hear my Nightingales. Perhaps (replied Belintha smiling) you may hear complaints in it as sweet as theirs; for Hesiod sings at least as well as they; and I see he beholds you with so much pleasure, and hears you with so great admiration, that I cannot assure but that he loves you a little too much already. I perceive (said Clymene) you have a design to jest, but yet I must tell you that when I saw Hesiod the first time upon the Banks of Hippocrene, he loved me a little, in less time than since his arrival. I confess it, (answered Hesiod) and I should certainly have always loved you, if I had always seen you. But Madam, your Fortune calling you elsewhere, and mine retaining me then at Helicon, I forsook you for the love of glory, which I have always since ardently affected. You see (replied Clymene, looking towards Belintha) it is my Destiny to loose my Conquests by ambition. Glory and Ambition (answered Hesiod) are not wholly alike. However, (said Clymene) I am very glad you are cured, and that I understand it from your own mouth. Hesiod blusht at this discourse, and going to answer to Clymene, he could not contain from saying with a great sigh,

*O gods! what is't I speak?
Alas! in speaking it, a sigh do's from me break.
And secret trouble from my passion grown
Tells me, my heart no longer is my own.*

As soon as Hesiod had spoken these Verses of Clymene, which he had remembred since Belintha shewed him them, he became much perplexed; but he found them so exact an answer, to that which Clymene had said to him, and they agreed so well with his thoughts, by changing only one word, that he could not hinder himself from uttering them. Nevertheless Clymene and Belintha both blusht when they heard them. The first looked upon her friend with indignation, and upon Hesiod with confusion; and Belintha on the contrary beheld Hesiod with anger, and Clymene with shame. Hesiod for his part lookt upon Belintha as if he desired her pardon, and upon Clymene with much love. But at length Belintha desiring to pacifie her friend, began to speak gently to her, and beseeched her to suspend her choller till she had heard her. And accordingly she told her of the accident of the Letter which Hesiod had seen, and which ingaged her though unwillingly to tell him what she knew concerning the love of Lyfcrates, which Hesiod could not but have learnt otherwise from a hundred persons. I grant what you say (answered Clymene) but in telling Hesiod what he would have known from others, there was no need of shewing him the Verses, which no person ever saw besides your self. Your having made them so amorous (replied she) caused me to think, that by shewing them to Hesiod when I was speaking of Lyfcrates, I should give him the greater aversion against him. But however (added she) I will make my peace with you, and am only troubled how Hesiod will make his with me. By desiring your pardon (answered he) and acknowledging to you ingeniously, that the excellent Verses of Clymene, so well expressed my thoughts, that I could not contain from speaking them; for if I should have studied all my life, I could not have made any so pertinent. I perceive (said Clymene smiling) that though I am offended with both of you, prudence obliges me to pardon you equally, and to reingratiate you together; for if I should be angry in good earnest, Belintha would perhaps shew my Verses to all the World, and possibly Hesiod might think I took that seriously, which he has spoken merely in a frolick: Wherefore I declare to you, that I pardon you, on condition you will never speak of those Verses to any person whatsoever, nor to me as long as you live. Though it be sufficiently difficult (answered Hesiod) to forbear commending them, yet provided you do not forbid me to speak of you and my self, I consent never to speak to you of any thing else. After this Clymene handsomely diverting the conversation, obliged them to change their discourse, and betake themselves to walk in several delightful places. In the mean time, evening drawing on, Belintha commanded her Chariot to be brought thither. 'Tis I (said Hesiod) that ought first to think of departing, for I promised the Prince to be with him again very betimes; but to speak truth, 'tis easie to forget things in the presence of Clymene. I know not (answered she) whether you forgot the Prince whilst you are with me, but I am assured you will forget me when you are with the Prince; for the Court is a place, wherein people usually think of nothing but what they see, and absent persons are little dreamt of. You have reason (replied Belintha smiling) but for such an absent as you are, I believe you are thought of every where. Our language is so rich and copious, (answered Clymene) that it was not necessary to make a new word to flatter me with. If I may judge of the sentiments of Belintha by my own (said Hesiod) she has reason to invent new words to tell you what she thinks; at least I know none that can express what I think of you. After this, Hesiod gave the hand to Belintha to lead her into her Chariot, and without remembring what he had said before concerning his promise, to be back early with the Prince; or considering that he might go faster on horseback than with Belintha, he desired of her a place in her Chariot, that he might have as he said, at least the pleasure to speak concerning Clymene, after his departure from her; and accordingly he went with this amiable Lady. During the way, he spoke of nothing but Clymene; sometimes he extolled her beauty, sometimes he admired her wit, he was charmed with her sweet deportment and modesty, the tenderness of her heart pleased him above all things, and he could not conceive how it was possible Lyfcrates could cease to love her; for I have a heart (said he) as ambitious as he; but I conceive if I had been in his place, ambition could not have destroyed my love, which would have been more ardent in a great, than a mean fortune. If you become amorous of Clymene (answered Belintha) we shall see how you will act. I assure you, (replied Hesiod) I will not examine what I have in my heart for Clymene, for fear of finding in it that which would be little advantageous unto me, if it should be in any great measure, for I know 'tis much more difficult to engage an intelligent person to love the second time than the first, especially when the former Love proved proved unfaithful: and therefore I am resolv'd to visit Clymene, as seldom as possible: for I have never had any true sentiments of love, but when I beheld her upon the Bank of Hippocrene, and when I saw her this day. In truth, it must needs have been love that caus'd me to repeat so precipitously and imprudently, the Verses which I remembred; for I was never before reproach'd for the least indiscretion. I would not (said Belintha) that you were very amorous of Clymene, for we ought never to desire evil to our friends: But I wish you had perswaded Clymene to come a little oftner to the City, and to desist from so obstinate a love of solitude. Clymene seem'd so lovely (answer'd he) that I believe if I saw her often enough to presume to perswade her not to hate the World so much, she might oblige me to prefer the desert she inhabits above all things; for I confess to you, I was never so much taken with any person as with Clymene. See her no more then (reply'd Belintha) for it would be too much to loose you, after having lost her. In this manner Hesiod and Belintha entertained themselves, till they arriv'd at the City. Whither, as soon as they were come, Hesiod went to wait upon the Prince, who chid him very obligingly, as also Lyfcrates did, for returning so late contrary to his promise. And the Prince having caus'd him to be diligently sought for, understood that he was gone to Clymene's house, though Hesiod intended to keep it secret from Belintha. Upon which taking occasion of pleasant raillery upon him, they very much surpris'd him. Do you know (said the Prince of Locri to him) that I had the most violent beginning of love for Clymene, that ever person had? and that if she had managed the inclination I had for her, there is nothing so difficult but she might have oblig'd me to; if she had pleas'd? but her coldness towards me, time, and reason, have cured me. As for Lyfcrates, who lov'd her extremely, and was not hated by her, I am perswaded the respect he had for me; oblig'd him to renounce a passion, which is sufficiently incomparable with all other kinds of obligation. I did not think, my Lord (answer'd Hesiod coldly) that reason and friendship were remedies for love; at least, I am assur'd they would never cure me, if I were amorous. But are not you Clymene's servant already? (said the Prince.) No doubt (answer'd Hesiod) I have much admiration for her; but as for love, I conceive none would dare to become amorous of that which you have lov'd. But on the contrary, (reply'd the Prince) your passion would afford me contentment for I am perswaded you have so curious a judgment, that your weakness would justify that of mine. Perhaps, my Lord (said Hesiod) Lyfcrates would not be of your opinion. I assure you, (answer'd the ambitious Lyfcrates) that the pleasures of the Prince are so dear to me, that being perswaded the love you have for Clymene, would excite you to make more Verses to divert it, I should counsel you to it, though I could still be your rival; but as the Prince was pleas'd to say, the purpose of confining my self inseparably to his service, has absolutely drawn me off from Clymene. Since it is so (said Hesiod smiling) for the future I shall not defend my self against the charms of Clymene, and give up the reins to my own inclination, in spite of the resistance of my reason.

After this, the Prince and Lyfcrates diverted to other discourse; but Hesiod did not cease to think of Clymene, when he ceas'd to speak of her, and as long as the evening last'd, he could not with draw his fancy from her. The next morning he made Verses upon her, the day after he sent to know her condition, and writ her a very gallant Letter, which she answer'd with much civility, though in a manner which signified, she had no desire to renew familiarity with the World, and would not discourse half of her Wit, though there appear'd very much whether she would or no. Some days after, Belintha and Hesiod return'd to the house of Clymene's Aunt, who receiv'd them very well, and promis'd them that as soon as winter began to make the Country naked, she would carry Clymene to the City. Whereupon Hesiod at his return, compos'd very handsome Verses, wherein he pray'd Winter to hasten, to appear with his Icicles, and conjur'd Autumn to make speed away; he wish'd the Spring would be slow in coming, to the end winter might continue the longer: He introduc'd the several pleasures of all the seasons, and beseech'd those which are peculiar to winter, to draw Clymene to the City, and retain her there so long as they could. Have a care said he, (with all the gracefulness that Poetry gives to this sort of things) of suffering your selves to be driven away too soon by the pleasures of the spring; which would carry her away from us to the Country; for these pleasures are not, in truth, but the pleasures of shepherds and shepherdesses, whereas you are really magnificent: pleasures which serve Princes and Kings, and assembling all worthy persons to the same places, have a thousand advantages above all those other half-savage pleasures, which have need of rivers, gardens, and fountains, to make them delightful. Then addressing again to winter, he exhorted him not to hurt the youth and beauty of the spring, assuring him, that whilst Clymene and he should be together, no person would think of desiring the season of roses. But though these Verses were excellent, Hesiod did not publish them, but shew'd them only to two or three persons; for perceiving his affection to Clymene growing very ardent, and come to a good degree already, and being not ignorant that a publick love is a love without pleasure, he kept secret all the compositions which he made upon this fair virgin; by which means there is none of them seen in the collection made of his Works, of which many other things also are lost. One thing was remarkable, that the same day he sent the Verses to Clymene, which he address'd to winter, the Sky was clouded, the wind became violent, and blew off most of the leaves of the trees, as if Winter had began that very day, and granted Hesiod's request. And accordingly the following days hapning to be more foul, Clymene being deprived of the benefit of walking, was constrain'd to return to the City with her Aunt. But though she was resolv'd to fly all the World as much as she could, yet being unwilling to appear too rustick, she could not avoid being seen by all the honorable persons of the Court. The Prince himself made her a visit, and carry'd Lyfcrates with him: but the Prince's heart being then affect'd towards another person; he beheld her without love, and spok'd of his former mer passion, as if he had spoken to a Friend. As for Lyfcrates, no doubt he could not see her without being troubled; but she treated him with so cold and fierce an aspect, and he was always so ambitious, that it may be said, what he resented then, was rather shame and perplexity, than love. But thence forward he never saw her, except in the presence of the Prince, and by consequence very rarely. The case was otherwise with Hesiod, who thought himself well in no other place; for though the Prince and Lyfcrates could not live without him, he could not live longer with them, because he could not live longer without Clymene. This very much perplexed him, for being the Favorite of the Favorite, who made use of him to be with the Prince, when himself could not, he had always a hundred businesses to do, which instead of being delightful to him as formerly, were then insupportable, because all that hindered him from seeing Clymene, was distastful to him. At first, ambition offered to oppose it self to this passion in his heart; but it was already so violent, that changing his sentiments in few days, he thought of nothing which took up his whole mind before, and derided his former ambition. How obliged am I to Clymene, (said he one day to one of his intimate Friends for having cured me of a Passion, whose pleasures are always unquiet, and for having given me another whose torments are ever agreeable. I must have lost my reason, could I have thought it possible to be happy with good fortune only. For indeed, provided a Man be content, what matters it whether it be in a Cottage or a Palace. Things without us, are not those which give true satisfaction, but the sentiments of the heart; so that since I look upon Clymene as a person who alone can make my felicity, and whose beauty, wit, and virtue, are of greater value than all the treasures of the World, wherefore should I confound my self in seeking happiness by other ways. Riches are things which are not desired, but to have several others; but the possession of a person whom we love passionately, and with reason, is satisfactory of it self. I confess to you (said his friend to him) that I find true wisdom, in that which you say; but that which amuses me, is, that thing of things, which you did not dream of a few days since. And yet you are not much improved in Wit in that time. I grant it, (replied Hesiod) but I have more Love, and contrary to the custom of that passion, which often enough injures Reason, it fortifies mine, and makes me know, that ambition is for the most part rather a weakness than a true greatness of Soul. If a Man could by just ways become Master of all the favors that a great Prince can confer, I conceive generosity would require him to endeavor to frame himself to do good to others; but however, I know not whether Reason would oblige him to put his Virtue to so difficult a proof. The danger is, (added he) that a man whose inclinations are very liberal when he is in credit, may sometimes be carried to some injustice by a principal of Virtue, and be as unjust as one that is covetous, to the end to obtain wherewith to be prodigal; but though this should not be, yet he is always lyable to be accused. All miserable persons believe, if they were in the places of those who are happy, they should do admirable things. In the mean time we see the greatest part of those whom fortune has raised, use their happiness ill, and forget their past infelicities, for fear of having pity of those of others. I could never have believ'd, (said Hesiod's Confident) your Love could have so well taught you morality. You deride me (answered Hesiod) but did you know what sweetness I feel being free from ambition, you would judge I have cause to hold my self extremely obliged to Clymene. Alas! my dear Hesiod, (replied he) A person that begins to love, sees only delightful things, hope renders all easie, he is so glad that he loves, and so delighted only in thinking that he may be loved again, that his heart abandons it self to joy, without having cause to do so, but if you continue to love Clymene, you will soon tell me other news. Do not doubt, my dear friend, (said Hesiod) whether I shall continue to love Clymene, for I find I shall love her till death, and I take no other care but to be loved, again by her. To which purpose Hesiod omitted nothing that might conduce, of all the diligences which an ingenious, amorous, and gallant person is capable of using, when he designs to be beloved. But though Clymene esteem'd him infinitely, notwithstanding her reluctance (for she desired to hate all men, and lived with such reservedness that there was no reasonable ground to hope to become happy) yet its true, hope so easily arises in the heart of a Lover, who loves ardently, that he can never absolutely despair: besides, Belintha loving Clymene very dearly, could have wished she did not hate Hesiod, to the end she might have loved her Defart less; and moreover, having much kindness for Hesiod, she could have been glad that the love he had for Clymene, would more straitly have confined him to Lori, than he was by the favors of the Prince and Lyfcrates, who being always desirous to establish himself more in the reputation he was in, was not unwilling to fasten Hesiod to his interests, to the end he might converse with the Prince, and have a faithful friend to accompany him in all his pleasures, when he could not himself. But this was so far from giving Hesiod contentment at that time, that he was disgusted with it, and ambition became so weakned in his heart, that he resented no other than that of being loved. He had also so great a contempt of Lyfcrates, in regard of what had passed between him and Clymene, that if prudence had not withheld him, he had rejected his friendship; for he not only undervalued all the agreeable qualities of Lyfcrates, but hated him, as if it had been himself that had been offended by him. Yet he perceived this sentiment was something strange; for said he, one day to himself, though unworthiness may be found in the procedure of Lyfcrates, yet it does not concern me to hate him; for if he were not guilty of this crime, he would be loved and happy, and I a thousand times more miserable than I am. 'Tis not added he, but that he contributes to my unhappiness another way, for he is the cause that all men are suspected by Clymene, and that she defends her heart against me, as she would do against him, if he should attempt to reconquer it. However, I ought not to despair, though I have no cause of hope given me: for as it is out of a sentiment of glory, that Clymene hates Lyfcrates, so so its possible out of a sentiment of equity, she may love a man who is totally contrary unto him. In the mean time, though Hesiodo visited Clymene very often, there was scarce any besides she, that understood he had no more ambition; for he frequently attended upon the Prince too, and Lyfiscrates, and deputed himself so prudently, that there was none but Clymene and Belintha, who observed the great passion he had in his Soul. So that Antiphanes, and Gauctor, Clymene's Brothers, looking upon him as a person that was much respected by the Prince and his Favorite, went to see him every day, and testified much friendship to him. On the other side, Hesiodo to render them favorable to him, ingratiated himself a little more in the Court, to the end he might do them some good office there, and have the more liberty to visit Clymene. But when this fair Lady in the beginning of the Spring returned to her Desert, it was easie to observe, that the cares of Hesiodo were divided; for he did nothing but make appointments to go see her, sometimes with her Brothers, very often with Belintha, and sometimes alone; no longer caring for Favor or Fortune, nor any thing but to see Clymene, to write to her, and to make Verses upon her, under the name of a Shepherdess. For his inclination leading him to speak of Countrey matters in his Verses, he conceived Love in Poetry had something more charming and more sweet with that resemblance of simplicity, than with that of Nymph or Goddesses. Clymene taking good notice of his sentiments, intreated Belintha several times, to endeavor to make Hesiodo change his intentions, but his Friend told her smiling, that till she forsook her solitary humor, she would rather send her a thousand Lovers, than free her from one. Things being in this posture, Hesiodo went for two days to the House of Clymene's Aunt, with her Brother, during which the Prince was gone to one of his houses in the Countrey, and had dispensed with him for following him. Belintha was likewise of this Company, with two other handsome Ladies her friends; so that the Desert was then very delightful. When Hesiodo was ready to set forth, a Packet was brought him from Lyfiscrates, and delivered to one of his attendants; he was minded to read it presently, but being told the Company waited only for him to depart with them, he referred the reading of it till he came upon the way. Yet he did not perform his intention, for Clymene so took up his mind, that he never remembered the Packet he had received, though he did not question but there was something in it which concerned the Prince's interest. So he went to Clymene's house in this forgetfulness, and which was more strange, was there till very late the next day without thinking of it; and 'tis likely he would have returned to Locri in the same manner, had not an accident befallen him. The house where Clymene dwelt being seated in a pleasant Countrey, walking was the chiefest delight it afforded. So, as soon as the Sun permitted the Ladies to enjoy that divertisement commodiously, Clymene obliged her friends to take the ayr. The company being one evening in a Meadow beset round with Willows, and divided by a River whose Banks were all covered with various sorts of flowers, they divided themselves insensibly; so that Clymene and

Hesiodo found themselves alone; separated from all the rest about thirty paces; some walkt, others sat down, and others sung. As for Clymene, having found a little flowry place on the bank of the River, where the little Dog she loved was layd down, she leaned against a Willow, and shewing Hesiodo the goodliness of the Countrey endeavored to hinder him from speaking to her of that which she saw well he had in his Soul. But to imploy him the more, she intreated him to shew her once again the Verses he had read to her an hour before, wherein he described the Countrey life after a very handsome manner. Hesiodo was willing to obey her with diligence, and sought for the Verses, but instead of them drew forth the Packet of Lyfiscrates, which he had not yet opened, and had received at his coming from Locri. This sight surpris'd him; but instead of being troubled at this adventure, as Lyfiscrates was for that of his own, when he let fall a Letter of Clymene in her presence without having opened it; Hesiodo laugh'd at it, and would have put up the Packet again without opening it, if Clymene who knew the hand and blusht at it, had not askt him whether he newly received it. No, Madam, (said he to her) and Artemides at whose house I Lodge can testify to you that I received it when I came from Locri. But why then did not you read it upon the way, or since you were here? (said Clymene.) Because I am wholly unlike Lyfiscrates, (answered he) and whereas Ambition destroyed love in his heart, love destroyes Ambition in mine. Clymene blusht at this discourse, and was very sorry for having been so curious; but because what Hesiodo spoke might still be diverted, she made no application of it, and without answering to it told him, it was fit he opened his Packet, for fear least there might be some Order from the Prince in it. For though (added she) I am an enemy to great Ambition, yet I am none to your happiness. If it be so, Madam (said he to her) it will be very easie for you to render me happy. In the interim, if you desire I should know the import of this Packet, be pleas'd to take the pains to read it; for in a place where you are, I can do nothing but behold and admire you. Though all that comes from Lyfiscrates displeases me (answered Clymene) yet out of respect to you I will see what he commands you: and accordingly she opened the Packet, and beheld in it a Letter from Lyfiscrates who desired him to come to the Prince, who had writ with his own hand these words at the bottom of the Letter;

I will not command you to come, because I would be more oblig'd to you if you come as soon as you know I desire it.

When Clymene had done reading the Contents of this Letter aloud; But what will you say to the Prince (said she) for not having obey'd him forthwith? I know not (answer'd Hesiodo) but I know I care not what he will say of it, provided that without being offended, you will suffer me to thank you for having cur'd me of Ambition. For indeed, Madam, though you should be all your life ungrateful to the most respectful passion that ever was, I ought always to thank you, for having having freed me from one, which has none but false pleasures, to give me another whose torments are delightful, and make me account my self more happy in being with you on the bank of this River, than I should be with the greatest Prince of the World if I were his Favourite. You are so perswaded (answer'd Clymene) of my hatred to ambition, because I hate an ambitious person, that you mind only speaking on that subject. But to hinder you from constraining your self unprofitably, I will act with you as with a man I esteem, and in whom I see a thousand good and delightful qualities——. I beseech you, Madam, (reply'd Hesiod) go not to cast me into despair, and fear nothing from my passion. If it be disgusting to you, I will conceal it as long as I live; but do not attempt to destroy it, for it would be in vain. And to hinder you from believing that I dissemble, when I say Love has destroy'd Ambition in my heart: If you please, I will never see the Prince nor Lyfcrates more, I will renounce all kind of society, I will disclaim all the World, and all my Friends; for you are all the World to me, you have united all my passions into one, and I consider only you in all the Universe; I will even renounce glory, if you desire it, though I have always much affected it, and there is nothing which I will not do to testify that I love you ardently. Hesiod spoke this with an earnestness so full of love that Clymene was surpris'd at it; notwithstanding she continu'd firm in the resolution she had taken, and answering with very much discretion, I confess to you (said she to him) the manner after which you speak, both surprises and afflicts me: for I know you so well, that I think I ought not wholly to dis-believe the truth of what you tell me. And therefore I am sorry to see that so deserving a person as you, constrains me to tell you things which afflict you. But I should be ingrateful, unjust, and a dissembler, if I conceal'd from you the true state of my Soul. I beseech you, do not conceive an ill-grounded hope of my sincerity; for I will hide nothing from you which may be to your advantage, nor dissemble that which is against you. I confess to you, that 'tis now some time since I understood I was not indifferent unto you, and though I believe you love me a little less than you think, yet I am convinc'd you love me more than I desire. I shall tell you once again that I esteem you as much as I can, that I see nothing in your heart, but what seems to me noble, nothing in your wit but handsome and excellent, that in renouncing Ambition for love of me, you do that only thing of the World which can be most agreeable unto me. But after all, Hesiod, I have so much injustice, as that I can never confide in the virtue of any whatsoever, after having been deceiv'd. And though you should believe I might in time change my sentiments, yet there is another obstacle which you can never surmount, which is, that you know I have lov'd Lyfcrates, and so I cannot think, if I should admit your affection, but that you would believe I had an easiness in my heart, which I have not, and that there needed no more but saying to one I love you, to oblige me to answer favourably. In the mean time this is so remote from truth, that with all your merit, and all the affection you profess for me, I believe you can never oblige me to love you: the most obliging expression I can give you, is, that if I had always continu'd to see you, when I first saw you at Helicon, and you had always lov'd me, no doubt I should never have lov'd Lyfcrates, but should have affected you. But, Madam, (said he to her) since you do me the honor to tell me, that if you had lov'd me heretofore, you would love me still, why will you not love me for the future, since you love Lyfcrates no longer? No question, I am not less worthy of your affection, than I was at that time; and I love you a thousand times more: consider then, Madam, consider well what you say, and do not attempt to deprive me of all hope, for I cannot but hope that the constancy of my Love will overcome all the obstacles, which oppose my happiness, and that you will not be always unjust. I beseech you, Madam, wherefore ought I to be punish'd for the unworthiness of my Rival, since I do not resemble him? He loves Fortune more than you, and I despise it only because I love you; Ambition grows in his heart in spite of his Love, and Love in mine, in spite of my Ambition. Lyfcrates could live no longer without a Palace, without Magnificence, and without a great number of flatterers which encompass him; and I should live happy with you only in a simple Cottage, in the midst of a wilderness, without all society but yours. Moreover, you ought not to imagine that I would think you had a general facility in your heart, if you favour'd my passion; for a Lover is not worthy to be lov'd, if he can suspect his Mistress of so great a defect; and he is not so much as worthy to be esteem'd, if he loves a person ardently whom he does not esteem infinitely. And besides, Madam (added he) having refus'd the heart of a Prince, and of a gallant and deserving Prince, you are sufficiently justify'd from that kind of weakness. Should all you say be true (reply'd Clymene) I should still have several reasons, which would oblige me to defend my heart obstinately; and therefore, Hesiod, leave me in peace in my Desert, and forsake not Fortune for a person who can never be but her own. Once more, leave her in quiet in her solitude, to enjoy a tranquillity, which gives time for agreeable musings; and continue in the tumult of the world, which has so much pleas'd you, and pleases you still more than you believe. You are unjust, Madam (answer'd Hesiod) for above these fifteen days I remember every moment four Verses, which I made in an ardency of mind, since I saw you, and repeat them sighing, a hundred times a day.

*O peaceful quiet, happy solitude!
Could I forsake you for inquietude?
Farewell Ambition, with Disasters cross,
What avails Greatness, when Content is lost?*

After this, Madam, (added he) will you still say you have not inspir'd me with the love of solitude: and accuse me always of loving the tumult of the Court, and the turmoil of affairs? I, (I say) who speaking against those who enrich themselves by unjust ways have declar'd that they were unhappy in not knowing, that sometimes the half is better than the whole, and that men were miserable in being ignorant, how sweet it is to live with the Herbs of ones own Garden;

Garden; since if they knew it, the labour of one day would suffice for their subsistence all the year. Judge then, if you have reason to accuse me. The Verses (reply'd she) which you recited, and those you speak of, please me well; but, you know, Poetry is oftentimes guilty of untruth. However, suffer me to thank you for having spoken so well of musing in few words; for it is really more Mistress of the World than is believ'd. After this Clymene, notwithstanding Hesiod's reluctance, went to join with the company, who all re-assembled together in a place very delightful, Belintha knowing Clymene and Hesiod admirably well, perceiv'd, as soon as she saw them, they had been speaking of something which employ'd their wits, whereupon, when night was come, and Belintha and Clymene were retir'd into their Chamber, Belintha ask'd her friend smilingly, if Hesiod recited Verses to her all the while he entertain'd her apart. I wish he had with all my heart (answer'd Clymene) he would less have perplex'd me than he did. But what was it he said (demanded Belintha) that troubled you so much. I beseech you, my dear Belintha, (answer'd she) do not still oppress me, but suffer me to forget all his discourse. When we desire so much to forget things (reply'd Belintha smiling) we never forget them at all: and moreover, to speak truth, I cannot conceive that so worthy a person as Hesiod, has told you any distastful matter; for he has not told you that he hates you. No, (answer'd Clymene blushing), but he has been so bold as to tell me he loves me, and to tell me so in such a manner, that persuades me he speaks no untruth. How? (said Belintha hastily) and is it the declaration of the love of a very worthy person that you would forget? Believe me (added she) do not endeavour it, for I have an absolute persuasion, 'tis the only thing of the World that was never forgotten by any. You speak with so little seriousness (answer'd Clymene) that I am almost inclin'd not to answer you any thing. You speak with so little sincerity (reply'd Belintha), that the best course I can take, is to discourse with you in raillery. You believe then (said Clymene) that I am willing Hesiod should love me. No, (answer'd Belintha) but I have a strong belief, that if Hesiod never does any thing but love you very respectfully, and very ardently, you will not hate him for it. Hatred is a great word (reply'd Clymene) but in the sentiment I am in, you will do me a very great pleasure, if you can hinder Hesiod from persisting to love me; for I am persuaded, the kindness you have for me, and that which he bears to you, makes more than half of his passion; and I am confident, the desire you have to draw me out of my Desert, has induc'd you to put the folly into his head, wherewith he entertain'd me to day. I should confirm your opinion more (answer'd Belintha): if I should tell you that he has spoken to you by my counsel, and give you occasion to believe, that what he has said to you is but a fiction; but being I am too sincere to do that, I tell you what I think, which is, that Hesiod loves you a thousand times more than Lyfiscrates ever did. However, (added she subtilly) I offer to do all that I shall be able, to hinder him from coming hither again, and I will also peremptorily forbid him in your name, if you please. I spoke to him with an aspect (reply'd Clymene, without taking notice of her friends subtilty) that perhaps will deter him from continuing to speak to me of his pretended passion. I will then say nothing to him (answer'd Belintha smiling.) Ah! cruel friend (cry'd Clymene) will you always deride me? After this, Belintha discours'd to her more seriously, telling her a thousand things to the advantage of Hesiod, conceiving nothing could happen more advantageous to her, for one of her humour, than to be lov'd by so excellent a person as he, and whose passion was both respectful and innocent. Nevertheless Clymene continu'd in her ordinary sentiments, however, in the bottom of her heart, she was not sorry that Hesiod lov'd her. Wherefore she recounted to Belintha very exactly, all that he had said to her, and the adventure of Lyfiscrates's Letter, very different from that of that ambitious Lover, towards whom she found her hatred and contempt increas'd, the more she began to esteem Hesiod. In the mean time, having read what Lyfiscrates had written to him, and the Prince's Postscript, she would oblige Hesiod to depart the next morning, to go to him; but he refus'd it, and chose rather to hazard the Prince's displeasure, than forsake Clymene, and give her ground to believe, that he was not capable of abandoning all for her sake. Yet he return'd at length to Locri, without having gain'd any thing upon the mind of this fair Virgin. At the return of the Prince, he excus'd himself the best he could, without much earnestness; but from that time, getting always greater familiarity with the brothers of Clymene, he was oftner in her Desert, than at Court: so that having such frequent occasions of speaking to her, and testifying his love, he began to shake the resolution she had taken, of never loving any. Nevertheless she conceal'd her sentiments for a long time, although she knew none ever had a more tender passion, than that of Hesiod for her. He admir'd all that she spoke, the least of her actions charm'd him, he lov'd the same things that she did; he observ'd even the places, where she us'd most frequently to walk, to the end he might go muse there alone, when she was not there, and he could not be with her. Clymene on the other side understanding his worth, virtue, and love more, resent'd a secret delight in being lov'd by Hesiod; and though she believ'd not that she lov'd him, yet she did not wish he would cease to love her. But at length the constancy of Hesiod, the counsels of Belintha, and Clymene's own inclination caus'd her to consent that he might speak the most secret sentiments of his heart to her; and, by degrees, she came to acknowledge that he had mov'd hers, and that, provided his affection were innocent and constant, he might assure himself he should be tenderly belov'd. Belintha also understood this strait engagement, and was the only Confident of this virtuous love. Hesiod desir'd then to oblige her to suffer him to speak to her relations, that he might marry her: but she told him, that having been once deceiv'd, she crav'd his pardon; if she could not so soon trust his affection, that she was a profess'd enemy to repentance, and that to the end they might never repent of their mutual affection, it was requisite they made yet a little longer tryal, whether it were as firmly establish'd as she desir'd.

In the mean time they did not cease to fancy to themselves a thousand contentments in a sweet and quiet life, which they design'd to lead, when their fortune should be inseparable. In which expectation, they enjoy'd a thousand innocent sweetnesses; their love was tender, delicate, and ingenious, to make them find out ways to render it secret. Belintba alone knew all that pass'd between these two persons; for after Hesioda came to be favoured by his Mistress, he spoke no more of his passion to that friend of his, to whom he had communicated something of it in the beginning. A slave, who was very faithful and ingenious, called Troilus, carried his Masters Letters, and brought him the answers of them. Hesioda and Clymene made little presents to one another of several gallant things, which pass'd not in the sight of the World but for gifts of friendship, though they were indeed testimonies of Love; they told one another all their thoughts; Hesioda writ nothing but he shew'd it to Clymene, and Clymene had not a thought but she told it to her dear Hesioda. She did that for him out of gallantry, which Belintba told him she would never do; for she gave him that beloved dog of hers, for her kindness to whom she had been so much reproacht. Thus by a thousand little obligations (which afford the greatest pleasures of love, when they are done with a certain way of dearness, which redoubles the sensibility of the hearts of those to whom they are perform'd) Hesioda and Clymene enjoy'd a thousand innocent pleasures. In this conjuncture (as all Courts are subject to sudden revolutions) so great a disgust hapned between the Prince and Lyfcrates, upon occasion of an Office which he had dispos'd of, that all the favor he could obtain of him, was to have permission to abide at an antient house of his in the Countrey, which was near to that where Clymene resided. This disgrace of Lyfcrates, no doubt did not much afflict this fair Virgin; nevertheless she was much troubled at his coming to be her neighbor, and much more some days after, when this disgraced Favorite, finding her by chance in a Walk, out of an odd humoursness of love felt his first flame so ardently rekindled, that without sticking a moment, he accosted Clymene: and seeing her alone, with two Women that follow'd her, while her Aunt was walking at a good distance with an old Priest; You see Madam (said he to her) that bad fortune returns me to you; but I shall take it for good, if you will please to forget all the crimes whereof you have accus'd me though they be not perhaps so great as you have believ'd them; for you know I began to be ambitious only for your sake. Is it possible Lyfcrates (answer'd she roughly) that you can have the boldness to speak to me as you do? and can you believe, without having lost your reason, that I am so poor of spirit, as to endure your affection again? No doubt you would be glad to find some consolation during your exile, and that in a time wherein all your flatterers have forsaken you, if I would admit of your flatteries; but, Lyfcrates, you are mistaken, it can never be, it will be much easier for you to make your peace with your Master, than to obtain your pardon of your Mistress. Bethink yourself therefore of returning to Court, and leave me in my desert; for if you make a custom to come and trouble me, I shall soon forsake it, only to be at distance from a man, whose discretion has been so bad, as that he has chosen rather to follow capricious fortune, who at length forsakes all whom she favors, than to be faithful to a person who lov'd you sufficiently, to esteem her self happy without the assistance of her benevolence. I beseech you, charming Clymene (cry'd Lyfcrates) do not cast me into despair; I consent, that all my past services be lost, do but you grant me the favour to begin anew to serve you, without having any other right to your affection, than that which a thousand diligences and respects may acquire for me in the time to come. No, no, Lyfcrates, (answer'd Clymene) I will not do what you desire; he that is once gone out of my heart, never finds re-entrance. If I hated you still (added she with a coldness full of scorn) perhaps it would not be impossible, but that I might love you again one day: but the manner of your acting with me, having made me pass from anger to hatred, and from hatred to contempt, and from that to a total indifference, no change can ever happen in my mind to your advantage. However, being you are unhappy, a little kind of generosity makes me forbear to speak any thing more severe to you; and I content my self with forbidding you ever to speak to me of your pretended affection, or to come to see me. After this Clymene left Lyfcrates, who dar'd not follow her, for fear of incensing her more against him: but love having really assum'd its antient place in his heart, he went the next morning to visit Clymene's Aunt, who receiv'd him civilly as an unfortunate person. Hesioda was there at the same time; but there was much difference in the manner, wherewith Clymene spoke to these two Rivals; for she spoke not to Lyfcrates, except to upbraid him; but to Hesioda with extream sweetness, who notwithstanding could not but resent some small discontent, to see Lyfcrates renew his Courtship to Clymene, which he presently took notice of. Sincerely (said he with a low voice to this fair Virgin) the misfortune of Lyfcrates afflicts me, and gives me cause to fear; I could wish rather for my own sake, that he were still the Prince's Favorite. I should take this ill (answer'd Clymene) if you spoke it seriously; but being there's no doubt but 'tis only to shew that you apprehend all that can be apprehended of things, I pardon you. However, if Lyfcrates does not break off coming hither, I will soon cure your mind of an ill-grounded jealousy. To which purpose Clymene having in vain prohibited him coming to seek her, endeavour'd to oblige her Aunt not to admit him more. But she being a good and generous person, believ'd it would be something unhandsome to forbid an exil'd person her house: Whereupon Clymene conjur'd her that she would please to go to Locri for some time, to the end she might avoid the unwelcome visits of Lyfcrates. This resolution gave very much joy to Hesioda; Belintba also was extreamly glad of it; and Lyfcrates in his desert saw himself equally cast off by his Master and his Mistress, and to make him the more unhappy, the two most violent passions in the world, continu'd in possession of his heart. For being then without any near hope to satiate them, they did not destroy one another, and he was ready to give himself himself again wholly to that which should afford him most ground of hope. In the mean time all the world rejoyc'd at Locri, for the return of Clymene, and Hesiod and she carried their affairs so well, that their affection pass'd rather for a gallant friendship, than a true love; because indeed among ingenious persons, there is a certain genius, which makes their affections mutually suitable and correspondent. About this time several Feasts were made, at which Clymene was present with delight; for though she always lov'd, and much affected solitude, yet she could not but love all companies where Hesiod made one, who, without variation of his sentiments, ever preferr'd her above all things, and was a thousand times more diligent in his attendance upon her, than on the Prince, whom he waited upon no oftner than decency enforc'd him, Clymene having never been so well satisfi'd as at that time, had never before appear'd so lovely; for besides that joy embelish'd her, she was of better humour, her wit was more pleasant, and she made so many conquests in a little time, that no discourse was more frequent, than concerning the charming excellencies of Clymene. The Prince himself having seen her again, after having broken off with a Mistress, whom he had at that time, re-engaged himself to love her, and resolv'd absolutely to conquer her heart by his addresses, without interposing his authority. By this means the felicity of Hesiod was strangely check'd; for though he had as much esteem as love, for Clymene, and when he listned to his own reason, could not suspect her to be unfaithful to him; nevertheless these two Rivals of his, strangely perplex'd him, and excited greater fear in him, than himself could reasonably approve. He was oblig'd both to the Prince and to Lyfcrates, reason and generosity requir'd him to be obsequious to the first, and respectful to the latter: but Love dictated to him to hate and destroy them, since they both employ'd all their endeavors to destroy his felicity, in establishing their own. But that which afflicted him most, was, that he could not reason to the contrary, but with like regret. If he consider'd that Lyfcrates was unhappy, and Clymene might, out of pitty, suffer her self to be regain'd by him; he imagin'd also that the Prince of Locri by the lustre of his quality and his authority, might at length come to please her: thus both the happy and the unhappy gave him inquietude. Yet the Prince's love gave him otherwise some consolation; for upon his declaring himself, that multitude of Lovers who throng'd to Clymene's house, retir'd, Lyfcrates also in his desert, was troubled to understand, that the Prince began to love Clymene again: that which augmented his grief, was, that he consider'd his Courtship as well prejudicial to his own passion, as to his ambition, because he fear'd lest this fair Virgin, to keep him in eternal exile, would admit of the Prince's affection upon that condition. Clymene on the other side, suffer'd as much as Hesiod and Lyfcrates: for being a person, whose affection was very tender and sincere for Hesiod, and whose great and virtuous soul was above ambition, she was extremely griev'd to see the love of the Prince and Lyfcrates, and to observe the discontent of Hesiod; for she knew not what remedy to use to it. When she was at Locri, the Prince visited her every hour; when she was in the Country, Lyfcrates troubled her, as much as he could, and she had no pleasure any longer, but what cost her a thousand regrets. Hesiod liv'd still at the same rate with her; but he sigh'd so often, when he could do it, without being seen by Clymene, that it was easie to be observ'd he suffer'd more than he profess'd; for out of a deep respect he had to her, he did not let her know that he was desperately jealous: Not that Clymene did one action, or spoke one word, which he could condemn; but the conjuncture of things seem'd so cross, that he could not hinder himself from fearing least the same destiny which occasion'd it, reserv'd some other of greater cruelty for him. Clymene on her part, did all she thought her self oblig'd to, to content Hesiod. She did not speak to him of the sentiments which she observ'd in his mind, because she would not complain of them; so that this unhappy Lover, not having so much as the comfort which complaint affords, suffer'd more than can be imagin'd, especially because he thought it always unfit to make any discovery of his jealousy. For (said he to himself) when any one has ground to be jealous, he ought not to think of complaining, but endeavour to love no longer; and if his jealousy be ill-grounded, it is unjust to go to torment an innocent person. Thus Hesiod's greatness of mind and respect, restrain'd him from discovering his jealousy, and he was more unhappy than all others that are possess'd by that passion. That which tormented him yet more strangely, was, That the Prince intreated him to make Verses in relation to his Love; but though he judg'd he would be displeas'd with him, he excus'd himself from it, and told him it was absolutely impossible for him to make Verses of that nature, if his heart were not touch'd with the same passion, and if he did not express his real sentiments. At this time there arriv'd at Locri, two Lydians, very skilful in Musick, especially in that kind which moves the heart, and excites it to tenderness, languishing, and love. They were persons of wit and honesty, and very great friends one to another; they both plaid so admirably upon the Harp, that none was heard go beyond them, since Orpheus, whether they plaid together or apart. But the wonder was, they were so well consoorted, that the same Instruments in the hands of an excellent Master, who has an exquisite ear, could not be more harmonious than their two Harps were. Their airs were very handsome, and accurately compos'd; and they sometimes made so mollifying and amorous a sound with the strings they toucht, that without the assistance of words, the hearers hearts were melted, and their minds mov'd to a transport; whereby disposing the sentiments of those in presence as they pleas'd, they constrain'd them to conspire with their harmony, and become merry or sad at their Will. But besides this admirable faculty, one of them not only compos'd excellent Sonnets, as well as his illustrious friend, but sung after so passionate and affecting a manner, that there were no words but appeared amorous in his mouth. So that these two excellent men being arriv'd at Locri, were the admiration and divertisement of the whole Court, and consequently were caress'd by all persons. The Prince caus'd the fair Clymene to hear them several times; but, however, none had so much interest in them, as Hesiod, who loved and understood Musick, and of whose compofure they sung several excellent Songs, having before been a long time in Greece. Hesiod knowing the power he had over them, especially over him that had the excellent voice, could not forbear to relieve the jealousy wherewith he was tormented, by making a Sonnet upon that Subject. Which when he had compos'd, he gave it secretly to that Lydian, who was so much his friend, and whose name was Ufclames, intreating him to set it to an air, futable to the words, and to tell the Prince and all the Court, when he sung it, that he had had it a long time, and knew not who was the author of the Verses: but to the end the business might be more concealed, Clymene was named Iris in the Sonnet, yet he would have the name of Shepherdess remain in it, that she whom it related to, might make the application of it, when she heard it sung. But after he had resolv'd the matter in this sort, he repented himself, and thought it would be better to use it otherwise. Therefore he requested that excellent Musician, only to make an air upon the words which he gave him, and set it down in Notes, without saying any thing, or taking notice, if it were shewn him to sing, that he had ever heard speak of it. And accordingly the matter was executed so; For after the air was compos'd, and the Lydian had delivered it to him in Notes, he writ the Sonnet all along in a disguised hand, to the end Clymene might read it afterwards. After which he folded it up, and by a slave unknown to his Mistress, sent it to her, with order not to discover who sent him. But the better to know how the thing would succeed, Ufclames who made the air, was at Clymene's house, when Hesiod sent the Sonnet; and as chance would have it, Belintha was there too; so that Hesiod could not fail of being well inform'd of that which past. The slave arriv'd, and presented the packet he was entrusted with to Clymene, who presently opened it, conceiving it was a Letter. But she was much surpriz'd when she beheld the following Sonnet in it, and sett two Notes after the manner made use of in Musick at that time.

Sonnet.

Iris when first under your Empire brought,
The cruel'st martyrdom, was sweet, I thought
And while you tortur'd, you did chiefly bless,
Alas! no jealousy did then my heart possess.

I hop'd my constancy, whilst yet no sense
Of love, had made in you indifference,
Had undergone your greatest rigidity:
Alas! no jealousy did then my heart possess.

Who would have thought, my doubled cares to you Should be to please you, and displease you too
At the same time, ungrateful Shepherdess?
Alas! no jealousy did then my heart possess.

As soon as Clymene had read the first couplets of this Sonnet, she knew Hesiod had made it, and suspected he that was then with her, had made the air. But that she might not discover her self too much, in case she was deceiv'd when she had read the Sonnet, she gave it to Ufclames, and addressing to him, I beseech you (said she) take the trouble to sing this Sonnet to me, before I send away him that brought it, to the end I may know whether the air of it be as passionate as the words. But, Madam, (answer'd he) I shall sing it so ill, if I do it without having studied it, that I shall do injury to him that sent it you. However (reply'd Clymene) I request you to sing it as well as you can, and take no care for the rest. The ingenious Lydian made shew of seeking out the air, and drew towards a window to study it, and singing half aloud, one would have thought he endeavour'd to make strains on the sudden. But at length the love of his own work not permitting him to sing an air of his own composing, he sung it admirably well, and made it appear to Clymene and Belintha, that it was perfectly fitted to the words, and that it would be hard to make an air of four short Verses with more gracefulness, sweetness, and passion than this. In truth (said Clymene then to him smiling) If your self had been the composer of this air, you could not have sung it better than you have done. After which, calling for her Writing instruments, she writ the Letter which follows in answer to him that had sent her the Sonnet.

I have so good an opinion of him that made the handsome Sonnet I receiv'd, that I believe she for whom it was made, can never give him cause of jealousy; yet it would have been pitty if he had not been jealous, since that passion has caus'd him to make such excellent Verses, and so handsome an air. Adieu; When you are willing to be known, you may be so.

After Clymene had writ this Letter, she shew'd it to those that were with her, that she might seem to make less matter of it; but for that she fear'd if it should be publish'd, it might prejudice Hesiod with the Prince, she desir'd Belintha, and Ufclames to be silent of it; as accordingly they were. But Clymene did not think that she had a young Slave to her Servant, who had an excellent voice, and without her observation, had heard all that was said, saving the request which she made to Belintha and Ufclames, not to speak of this adventure. In the mean time Hesiod hearing in what manner Clymene had receiv'd his Sonnet, knew she understood he was the Author of it, and finding a sufficient sweetness in her Letter, he was glad he had intimated his jealousy to her without offending her. Therefore he thank'd Ufclames, and intreated him to keep his secret faithfully; and discover'd himself also to Belintha, that she might be the more secret in it; for a sincere confidence is more obliging to fidelity, than that which trusts a thing by halves. The next morning he went to Clymene's house, and came thither so conveniently, that he found her all alone. As soon as she saw him, she chang'd colour, and reproving reproving him obligingly for his jealousy; Is it true (said she to him) that you have so bad an opinion of me as to be jealous? Ah! Madam (answered he) can you think it possible for me to love you without jealousy, when I see I have two such Rivals? Lysicrates as you know, has had the glory not to be hated so long as he was not Ambitious; and the Prince of Locri has so many qualifications to make himself loved, that I could not but fear he might come to be so. So that all I could do, was respectfully to conceal my jealousy from you. What you say, is ingenious, (replied Clymene) and there may be some appearance of love in it; nevertheless, there is none at all, and the jealousy you are possessed with cannot be caused but by a weakness of your heart, or an unjust diffidence of my fidelity. But to testify to you (added she) that I do all I can to comfort you, tell me what course I shall take to cure your mind. You know my unhappy fortune permits me not to be any where else but at Locri, or in the Country: if I am in my Desert, Lysicrates causes your suspicion; if I am here, the Prince's love makes you jealous; and in the mean time I know no where else to be. What then can I do more than I do? that is, I treat Lysicrates rudely, I give the Prince no hope, and I grant you all the innocent favors that Virtue permits me. Speak Hesiod; and if I can do any thing more for you, tell it me; but consult your reason a little, and do not follow only your passion. Alas! Madam, (answered he) I do no longer distinguish the counsels of my reason from those of my love, and I am so little master of my self, that I am not able to answer any thing. All I can say, is, that my jealousy is caused only by excess of love; for I esteem you more than you can imagine, and I can never believe you capable of doing any thing which is not just. But after all, I do not cease to fear, and I imagine sometimes that perhaps you ought not to love me, and that I am not generous enough in not counselling you to embrace the passion the Prince has for you, and to banish me. But to speak truth, this thought is so weak in my Soul, so little durable, and a moment after I find it so opposite to true love, that I repent of it as of a crime. You have reason (replied Clymene) and I like better your being jealous than generous in that manner, though I very much love generosity. I am obliged to you for this sentiment, Madam; (answered Hesiod) and I should be much more if you could take the resolution to prefer the dearth and fidelity of my love above all things. Is it not to prefer you above all things (replied she) not to love any but you in the whole world, and to condemn all mankind for your sake? 'Tis far more than I deserve (answered he) but 'tis not enough, to render me happy; for to overcome all the infelicities that persecute us, it is requisite you would please our fortunes should become inseparable. But Hesiod (replied she) do you not consider what you say; for do you think the Prince would leave us in peace if you had married me? and do you imagine my Brothers, whose inclinations are low, and devoted to interest, and who expect all their fortune from the Love the Prince professes to me, will consent to our happiness. No Madam, (answered he) but 'nce you love me so much as to despise the Prince's affection, and consequently have no intention to advance the fortune of Ganetor and Antiphanes, at the loss of your own contentment; It will be requisite to render me happy without their consent, to forsake Locri, and go to Helicon, where I have fortune enough to content a person so generous as you are. Though that which you propose to me, (replied Clymene) be such that I think I cannot resolve upon it, yet I do not take it ill that you have proposed it; because it not being contrary to innocence, I am equitable enough not to be displeased that you desire a thing of me, which seemliness will not suffer me to grant. For though I have neither Father nor Mother, and my Brothers have comported themselves towards me after a manner, which may dispense with me for part of the respect I give them, yet it is something disagreeable to a person who scrupulously loves her reputation, to forsake her Relations and follow the Fortune of a man out of her Native Country though she marry him. Therefore I conjure you, make this proposal no more to me, and let us await our happiness from Time, and our own Virtue. If Lysicrates do not speedily make his peace with the Prince, I am persuaded the Prince will banish him out of his Country, and if Fortune recall him to the Court, he will leave me in quiet in my Desert, whither I will return as soon as he has left it. And as for the Prince, no doubt he will soon change his sentiments; for 'tis not the custom for persons of that quality to make long Courtship. Therefore have a little patience, and in the mean time if you will oblige me considerably, be not jealous at all, or at least be so indifferently; for as to wholly disclaiming that passion, I am not scrupulous to oblige you to a thing sufficiently difficult, if it be true that you love me ardently. Alas! Madam, (answered he) do not you know that 'tis almost as impossible to give bounds to jealousy as to the Sea; and that when a person begins to be possessed with it, he cannot hinder its increase? So that Madam, it is rather in your power than mine to restrain it; for I doubt not but if you will take some care of an unhappy person who loves you infinitely, you will hinder him from abandoning himself to that furious passion which wholly engages all that are possessed by it, and is a greater enemy to reason, than love which occasions it. After this, Clymene discoursed with Hesiod with so much virtue and dearth, that part of his jealousy was dispelled. Yet the calm which re-established in his mind continued not long; for the next morning there hapned an accident which afflicted him sensibly.

The Prince being in Clymene's chamber where those two famous Lydians made an admirable concert for an hour, which charmed all the company, afterwards obliged Uscames to sing an air; but whilst he was tuning his harp to obey him, the Prince began to reprove Hesiod obligingly, for having refused to make Verses at his request; who desiring to divert that discourse, took occasion to tell him that Clymene had a young slave whose voice was so excellent, that had she had the art of Uscames, she would have ravished all the World. The Prince who was willing to take notice of all that belonged to Clymene, desired the might be called, to the end Uscames might hear her, her, and judge whether her voice deserved the trouble of teaching. Whereupon Clymene, who was more willing to entertain the Prince with singing than discourse, commanded the young slave to be called. She was cheerful, sprightly, confident enough, and very obedient; so as soon as her Mistress commanded her to sing, she began. But Clymene, Belintha, Hesioda, and Uscames were strangely surpris'd when they heard her sing the first couplet of Hesioda's Sonnet, for they had taken no heed to this young slave, and suspected not she could have remembered it. Clymene blusht, Hesioda was amazed, Uscames beheld her with astonishment, and Belintha could not contain from bidding her sing another. Upon which the Prince observing these several commotions, asked Belintha why she would not have the Girl sing that song, which seem'd to him very pleasant? Because 'tis so old (answered she blushing) that no body sings it. For my part (reply'd the Prince) I never heard it. In truth, my Lord (said the young Slave confidently, whilst Clymene was whispering something to Uscames), 'tis probable you have not heard it; for it is so new that a man whom I know brought it yesterday in Notes to my Mistress. This answer raising the Prince's suspicion, caus'd him to ask her who gave her this Sonnet. This discreet Virgin, judging it more dangerous to deny than confess it, told him she knew nothing of it, and that Uscames was present when it was brought her. For my part (said Belintha) I believe it was intended more to Uscames than to Clymene; for it seems to have been made by some one, who would intimate to him that he is not the only composer of handsome ayrs. But why did you say (answered the Prince) that the Sonnet was old? In truth, my Lord (reply'd she) I can give no other reason but that I was so unwilling to hear an ayr sung ill, which Uscames yesterday sung admirably, that I endeavor'd to divert the Girl from singing it. Since Uscames sings it so well then (said the Prince) I desire I may have the pleasure to hear him. Perhaps my Lord, (answered Uscames), having sung it but once, I shall not well remember it. But being it was sent with Notes to Clymene (reply'd he) you may sing it as well to day as yesterday. Clymene conceiving it unfit to make so much difficulty to shew it, since the Verses were written in an unknown hand, gave it to Uscames, from whose hands the Prince took it, calling Hesioda to him, to help him (he said) to conjecture who was the Author of it. If it were a greater work (answered Hesioda) it would be easier to find out who had compos'd the Verses; but three couplets of a Sonnet, which run all in the same strain, are not very fit to discover the composer by. Yet there is a certain close (reply'd the Prince roughly).

Which makes me suspect one person. But to judge of the ayr as well as of the words, it is requisite to hear Uscames sing. Then this illustrious Lydian making semblance of not understanding it, sung it as if he were unassur'd whether he did right or no. But though he disssembled, the Prince understood that he had compos'd the ayr of this Sonnet, and suspected Hesioda to have made the Words. This suspicion was no sooner in his mind, but he lookt upon Clymene, so unhappily for her, for Hesioda, and for himself, that he perceiv'd some kind of correspondence in the looks of Hesioda, and this fair virgin: so that recalling a hundred past things, he became jealous in a moment, and did not doubt, but that the negligent attendance of Hesioda on him, was an effect of his love to Clymene, and that the rigor of Clymene was an effect of her affection to Hesioda. For (said he within himself) if she were amorous of no person, it were not possible but she would embrace the affection of a Prince, who is able to advance her fortune. Being of a violent humor, he could not altogether hide the agitation of his mind, yet he did not declare himself then, but went away in great haste, only telling Clymene as he departed, that the next time he saw her, he would tell her who had made both the ayr, and the words of this Sonnet. You will do me a pleasure, my Lord (answered Clymene coldly) for in truth I know him not. If you did not know him (reply'd he as he went forth of her Chamber) I should not, and I know him only because you do, and your eyes have told me. Having spoken this with sufficient fierceness, he went away: Hesioda was oblig'd to follow him, and so was Uscames: so that only Belintha was left with Clymene, who did not think it prudent to chide the young Slave much, who had caus'd so troublesome an adventure, but told Belintha she had not done well in saying the Sonnet was old. Belintha, answered, she was too much astonish'd; and thus unprofitably blaming themselves, they ended their discourse with complaints; for they very much feared the Prince would banish Hesioda if he came to know certainly that he was his Rival, and was loved. As soon as Hesioda could get at liberty from the Prince, he return'd to the house of Clymene, with whom he had discours'd with very tender resentment. Yet they resolv'd never to discover the truth, for Uscames was so much a man of honor, that they did not fear he would fail of his promise. In the mean time the Prince having well consider'd what had hapn'd, resolv'd not to testifie his thoughts openly, till he fully understood the matter: in order whereunto knowing Clymene's brothers were ambitious, and would sacrifice all to their own interest; that Antiphanes was subtle, and Ganetor sufficiently pragmatical, he resolv'd to make use of them, to discover really whether Hesioda were amorous of Clymene, and Clymene loved him. He spok to them both therefore apart, and gave them ground to hope all things from him, and intimated as if it were possible he might marry their Sister, in case he could be loved by her, and so at length dispos'd them to be faithful Spies for him with her. But though he had much recommended the secret to them, and told them all he thought concerning the Sonnet, yet they communicat'd it to one who told it several others. So that within three days, it was nois'd throughout both Court and City that Hesioda was amorous of Clymene, and that he was jealous of her; and Hesioda's Sonnet was so generally known that there was scarce any person but sung,

Alas!

Alas! no jealousy did then my heart possess.

By which means the news of this adventure flying to Lysicrates's Desert, sensibly afflicted him, for he conceived that if Clymene loved Hesiodé, it would be impossible for him ever to regain her heart. Wherefore, having then no hope either to re-ingratiate with the Prince, or recover Clymene's affection, he found himself extremely unhappy, and more within a few days after, when Clymene's brothers, relating to the Prince whatsoever they heard or knew, to make themselves look't upon as necessary instruments, told him that Lysicrates was again become amorous of their Sister, although they had received divers good Offices from him during the time of his being a Favorite. The Prince was so incensed with this news, that he sent to command Lysicrates to depart his Dominions, and it was not without much difficulty that he obtained fifteen days to take order for his affairs. In the mean time Antiphanes and Ganetor forgetting nothing in order to discovering the truth, having gained that young Slave to their purpose, who so unseasonably sung the Sonnet, they understood by her that Troilus the faithful Slave of Hesiodé brought Letters to Clymene very frequently, and that she used to put them in a Cabinet, to the sight of which she admitted no person besides her self. After they had learnt this, they made an appointment for a Walk of recreation in a place a good distance from Lacri, to the end their Sister might be obliged to be present at the entertainment. But at the very moment they were to set forth, Ganetor fained himself sick, and went not with the Company. As soon as they were gone, he sent away upon several pretended occasions all those that might oppose his purpose, and having none with him, but the young slave whom he had corrupted in Clymene's Chamber, he sent for a man who was very dextrous at such businesses to cause him to open and shut again Clymene's Cabinet, wherein she carefully kept all Hesiodé's Letters. By this means Ganetor came to know the whole secret of the innocent affection of Clymene and Hesiodé. But though he found nothing but what attested the virtue of his Sister, yet looking upon this Love of hers as an obstacle to the advancement of his fortune, he came on a sudden to hate both his Sister and Hesiodé. However, he caused the Cabinet to be made fast again, putting into it all the Letters he had seen, and the Verses Hesiodé had made in secret for her. And he did all this so exactly in the same order he found it, that Clymene perceived nothing at her return. But when Antiphanes spoke with Ganetor, he was much surprised to learn what he told him; but though they resolved absolutely to serve the Prince, even with the loss of their sister's glory if he pleased, rather than not promote their Fortune, after having well considered the matter, they thought it not fit to discover the whole truth to the Prince, because in case he should know Clymene preferred Hesiodé before himself, he might cease to love her. Therefore they resolved only to say that they had discovered beyond all doubt, that Hesiodé loved their Sister, but that they could not yet find out whether or no he were beloved by her. They also determined to speak to Clymene, very mildly at first, and afterwards if she would not yield, to threaten her, and to have recourse to the ways of greatest violence. So they told the Prince all they had resolved to acquaint him with, who being assured of Hesiodé's love, began to hate him as much as he had formerly loved him, and took up a resolution to banish him as well as Lysicrates. Yet he deferred it for some days, because he was desirous to know fully whether he were loved by Clymene, which could not be discovered but during his abiding there. But upon divers occasions he made it sufficiently apparent that he had changed his sentiments towards Hesiodé. For falling in discourse to speak of Homer and him; he laughed and said, Homer was the Poet of the Lacedemonians, because he taught War; but Hesiodé only the Poet of the Helotes, because he treated very much about agriculture; detracting by this raillery from the glory of Hesiodé. In the mean time Antiphanes and Ganetor took occasion one morning to speak to Clymene. At first they flattered her, and told her with much sweetness, all they desired from her; but perceiving that, though she answered them with much civility, they could not bring her to what they wish't, they fell into strange insolence against her. What? (said Ganetor to her) have you so pitiful a spirit as to prefer a man that pretends to be a Wit, before a Prince? to have no consideration of the greatness of your house, nor the fortune of your brothers, provided you may satisfy a foolish passion that is entered into your head? Ah cruel sister that you are! you shall repent it, and your best course will be, to be cruel to Hesiodé, if you love him. Clymene being transported with grief, to hear her Brother speak in this sort, could not contain from breaking out into these terms. Alas! (said she) how cruel are ye, who can have the injustice to think of destroying an innocent person, who has done you service in a thousand occasions, and whose virtue is far above the rank of the greatest Princes in the World? how can you be the confidants of the Prince's love, and purchase your advancement with the price of my honor, for without telling you that I love Hesiodé, or am loved by him, I only intimate to you, what you are not ignorant of, that Sovereigns never marry for love, and therefore according to reason being obliged to look upon the passion your Prince has for me, as criminal, you ought not to be his agents and confidants in it; you ought rather to die with shame, for seeking your fortune by so unjust a course; for if I were in your place, I should rather go seek it at the Wars, and owe it to my Sword, than to my Sister's eyes. Perhaps we will follow part of your counsel (answered Antiphanes sufficiently rudely) and taking his brother by the arm to cause him to go away out of Clymene's Chamber, these two furious persons left her. Clymene then repenting of having spoken so much to them, endeavored to retain and appease them, but they would hear her no longer, and left her in incredible sorrow. Her grief became yet more perplexing some days after, for Hesiodé discovered by the faithful Troilus, that Lysicrates, (who during the time of his being favorite, had gotten together wherewith to be rich, into what place soever he went) caused all his most precious things and wealth to be put into a ship; and to revenge himself of the Prince, and satisfy his own love, he layd a design to carry Clymene away with him by violence; and being very much beloved by the Officers of the Prince, he was advertised that himself was suddenly to be banisht. Clymene was infinitely perplext at the understanding of these two misfortunes which were designed to her. On the one side, she was in fear for Hesiod's life, knowing that her brothers were capable of the most violent resolutions; she considered his banishment with more horror than death, and was more in fear of being carried away by Lyfcrates, than of dying, and she so dreaded to stay alone under the power of the Prince who loved her, that she knew not which of all her unhappinesses to fear most. Alas! (said she to Hesiod with extream sorrow) Is it possible for an affection so innocent as ours to be so unhappy? and are you a criminal for loving one that loves you? Ah! my dear Clymene (answered he) 'tis no crime of yours, for if you loved me perfectly, we should not be long unhappy. I have told you formerly, that I have wealth enough to be happy with a person that can be contented with things handsome and convenient. So that if you were capable of taking up a generous resolution, I would marry you with the consent of your Aunt, to whom alone you owe respect (since your brothers are not worthy to be what they are) and so uniting our fortunes together for ever, we shall escape both the violence of the Prince, and Lyfcrates, and the injustice of Antiphantes and Ganctor, for whom I will always have some consideration, though I know well they hate me in perfection. I perceive indeed (answered Clymene) that that which you propound to me, is the only thing which can rescue us from all the pressures of unhappiness together, but (my dear Hesiod) I have so little accustomed to do any thing inconsistent with ordinary seemliness, that I find a strange repugnance in my self, to examine only whether this ought or ought not to be done. And if we should not be able to execute our design, but be discovered, we should make our fortunes worse, and be a hundred times more miserable. Alas, my dear Clymene (replied Hesiod) Is there a greater unhappiness than to be constrained to be separated, and that for ever? This, no doubt, is the greatest (answered Clymene) but if I should see you a prisoner for my sake, and I should live under the power of the Prince, or in the possession of Lyfcrates, I should perhaps be in a condition more deserving compassion. But Madam, (replied he) when I shall have received the command, which must cause me to depart the dominions of the Prince of Locri, if I obey him, will you not find your self under his Power? will you not be in danger of Lyfcrates's violence? and if I do not obey him, as there is great likelihood I shall not be able to obey him, shall I not be in danger of the things which you can most fear? For as for my self, Madam, I confess to you, I cannot resolve to forsake you; and I conceive if you determine not to render me happy, I shall be forced to take some course to conceal my self here in the house of some friend, to the end to be always in place where I may defend you, or at least to have the sad consolation of dying near you. Consider therefore Madam, what you intend to do; but above all things do not constrain your sentiments; and if to my unhappiness, there be in your heart any thought favorable to the Prince, be so generous as to tell me; for if it be so, I have nothing to do but dye, and I shall have respect enough for you, to go and dye out of your presence. Ah! cruel as you are (cried she) can you only imagine that what you say is possible? If it be not (answered he) why will you not resolve to take the only course which can render us happy; for if you do not take it, I declare to you, I cannot hinder my self from believing that I am not necessary to your felicity, that you can live without me, that you believe I am able to live without you, and that measuring my affection by your own, you are utterly ignorant what a true love requires. For where perfect love is, Madam, a person that is loved cannot be refused in any thing which is not contrary to love. And besides, is there any crime in my request? are not you alone Mistress of your own will? is it not free to choose with whom to spend ones life? and would it not even be against virtue, not to follow my fortune? You have promised me an eternal love, and notwithstanding you are willing to break it, without any other reason to tell me, than that in marrying you secretly, with the consent of your Aunt, who you know will approve it you shall commit, you say something incongruous to ordinary decency. Is it not sufficient (added he) that what I desire is not repugnant to innocence? grant it me then (continued this Lover falling upon his knee, and taking her by the hand, which he grasped with extream dearness, and do not render me, the most unfortunate of men. As Clymene was considering what she should answer, Belimba entered, who seemed very sad. A moment after, some person coming for some small business to Clymene, she was obliged to go to the door of her chamber: and Belimba took the occasion to speak to her apart: I am infinitely grieved (said she to her) that I must tell you what I newly understood, to wit, that your brothers have conceived so horrible a hatred against Hesiod, that you ought to fear all things from their violence: do not ask me farther, but if you will follow my counsel, oblige him to go out of the way for some time. Clymene then repented an extream grief, though she had not the liberty to relieve it; for at that very instant, the Captain of the Prince's guards came thither, who finding her at her chamber door, I desire your pardon, Madam, (said he to her) for the unwelcome commands I have to acquaint you with. The Prince having understood Hesiod was here, gave me order to come and seek him. Hesiod hearing himself named, advanced towards the Captain of the guards, who told him, with all the civility his office permitted him to have in this displeasing occasion, that the Prince commanded him to depart from Locri the next day, and out of his Dominions two days after. Hesiod's mind being prepared for this command, he appeared not at all surpris'd with it, but answered him that brought it, without being moved; who having done his Message, departed, and left these three persons at their liberty, of speaking what they thought for

for Belintha so well understood all that past between Hesioda and Clymene, that she did not prejudice their freedom. Then it was, the amiable Clymene felt her soul cruelly afflicted, and Hesioda making his last attempt to move her, desir'd the assistance of Belintha, as a faithful friend. For my part (answer'd this generous Lady) though I must lose Clymene if she does what I desire, yet there is no doubt, I had rather never see her more, than see her unhappy. And moreover (added she) having some relations at Helicon, I hope I shall not lose her for ever. Whilst Belintha was speaking thus, Clymene wept, and had not the power to speak. But at length after Hesioda had us'd the most passionate expressions in the world to her, and Belintha had press'd her to take up a generous resolution, she told Hesioda, that provided he would consent she should marry him, she would then consent to follow his fortune, and endeavour to get away secretly, in case her Aunt would not forsake her. Hesioda then express'd all that a dear Love could inspire him with, to thank Clymene: after which, Belintha went to move her Aunt, and acquitted her self so well of this commission, and so urgently represented all the sad consequences which might attend their adventure, that this woman (who hated her Nephews, lov'd her Niece dearly, had no children, whose treasure and jewels was easie to transport, and who was perswaded the Prince's love to Clymene was not innocent) easily inclin'd to that which Belintha propounded. Whereupon going to find Hesioda and Clymene, they consider'd all together what they had to do. The result was, that to take away all the Prince's suspicion, Hesioda should depart the next morning from Locri, and should likewise give out, that he intended to leave the dominions of the Prince within two days after; but should go and conceal himself in a little house of Belintha's, upon the sea-side beyond Molycria, not far from the Temple of Neptune; in which, two days after, a great sacrifice was to be made, where every year was a great confluence of persons of all conditions. That in the mean time Clymene's Aunt should be at the sacrifice, that afterwards Belintha should carry her to her house where Hesioda was conceal'd, and that the night following they should embark in a little Fisher's Vessel, to deceive those who might have any knowledge of their departure; that afterwards they should land fifty furlongs from thence, in a place where horses should attend them, that so they might go to a Town, and provide a chariot to carry them to Helicon, where their marriage was to be accomplish'd. Hesioda nevertheless, for his own satisfaction, desir'd Clymene that she would promise him to be his, in the presence of his Aunt and Belintha; which being done, fill'd him with a joy greater than he was able to express. But, not to give any suspicion, Belintha told Hesioda, it was not convenient for him to stay longer with Clymene; and accordingly, having entertain'd her apart a quarter of an hour, whilst Belintha was speaking to her Aunt, he bid her adieu; and though he knew this separation was not to be long, yet he was seiz'd with incredible regret, and fear'd in the bottom of his heart (notwithstanding all his endeavours against it) lest some great unhappiness should befall him, when he was gone out of her fight. He fancied, that as soon as he should be out of Locri, the Prince would attempt to do some violence to him, or that Lysicrates would carry her away when she went to the sacrifice, Clymene perceiving so great a sorrow in his eyes, was so sensibly mov'd with it, that she could not contain from endeavouring to comfort him. She gave him her hand very obligingly, and looking upon him with as much love as modesty, You seem to me (said this discreet Virgin) so afflicted for an absence of three days, that I am glad I have not condemn'd you to eternal separation. Go then my dear Hesioda, go; but that you may expect me with some contentment, believe, I conjure you, that I should have been as miserable as you, if I had not consented to our happiness.

May I believe it, Madam (answer'd Hesioda) and may I go and wait for you with the satisfaction of thinking that you leave your Country without repugnance for my sake, and that without me you could not live happy? Yes, my dear Hesioda, you may, (reply'd she) and there is nothing so obliging which I do not permit you to believe, now virtue doth not prohibit me. After this he kiss'd her hand respectfully, and left her to go and provide for her departure. But Antiphanes and Ganctor causing Clymene to be always observ'd by the young slave whom they had corrupted, understood confusedly, that Hesioda had had a long conversation with her, Belintha, and their Aunt; and that this Lover parted from Clymene after a certain manner, which might seem to intimate, it was not with intention of never seeing her more; which highly exasperated their former indignation. In the mean time Clymene's Aunt, to give the less suspicion of her design, went to her house in the Country without carrying Clymene thither. The next day after Hesioda's departure, Lysicrates hearing of it, went to see her, and profess'd so violent a passion for her Niece, that he seem'd never to have been more amorous of her, than at that time. And indeed, pretending no longer to the Prince's favour who banish'd him, Love resum'd new force in his heart: wherefore confirming himself in the design he had to carry away Clymene, and knowing she was wont to go to the Temple of Neptune, the day the great sacrifice was to be made there, and then to go and lodge at the house of Belintha, which stood not far from the Temple, he resolv'd to execute his design that day, and took no other care but in order to it. On the other side, Hesioda obeying the Prince's Orders in appearance, departed from Locri, and being unwilling to carry any other attendants with him, besides his faithful Troilus, whom he had brought out of his own Country, he discharg'd the other slaves he had hir'd at Locri, and went only followed by this, to whom he carefully recommended the favour'd dog which Clymene had given him, as a token of love. All the Court was troubled for Hesioda's exile, the Ladies, repin'd, and the people murmured after a manner, which made it evident how great his reputation was. As for the Prince, he was extream joyful, when it was told him Hesioda had obeyed his Orders: but at length, the day of sacrifice being come, Clymene's Aunt, who was return'd out of the Country, took a Chariot with Belintha and her Niece, and went to that famous sacrifice, where a numerous multitude was assembled, But as for Clymene, she went thither with a joy wholly peculiar to her self, in the thought, that after the sacrifice, she should go to the house of Belintha, that she should there see her dear Hesiod, and soon after be out of the jurisdictions of the Prince of Locri, without fearing the violence of Lysicrates, and that she should at length see her self inseparably united to the fortune of that man, whom alone in the world she could affect. Thus she went thither with her mind fill'd with a thousand delightful thoughts, she was indeed something troubled to think she should leave her dear Belintha; but the hope of seeing her again at Helicon, comforted her for part of that discontent. So they arriv'd at the Temple of Neptune, which stands on the Sea shore, not far from the Cape of Rium, in a very pleasant situation; for it has a prospect to the delightful City of Molycria, which appears in a half circle towards the Sea, which lies immensely patent to the view, from the gate of Neptune's Temple, which is bedeckt with Sea-ornaments. For between the pillars are seen several statues of the Nereides, and upon the bases of the pillars, and the friezes which are about the Temple, several large sculptures, representing the Trophies of prows of ships, oars put across, broken boats, and shatter'd sails. The day appointed for this famous sacrifice was so fair, that never was a more glorious seen; and the Sea so calm, that one would have thought all the waves had even'd themselves for the more decent celebration of this Festival of Neptune. The sacrifice was begun with all the customs requisite; but because there use to be several delightful passages to be seen on such occasions, Scaffolds were erected for the Ladies of quality, before the great Gate of the Temple, where the ceremony was perform'd. Clymene was upon one of these scaffolds, well dispos'd to take much pleasure in the ceremony; for though the Prince was present there, yet she was free from trouble, because it belong'd to him to be always near him that offer'd the sacrifice in his name and that according to the laws of the ceremony, he was not to go out of the Temple till night ended it. So his presence was no obstacle to the secret design of Clymene, wherefore she appear'd very pleasant, and took delight in beholding all the various offerings which were brought thither a little before the sacrifice. First, two hundred Fishermen, very agreeably attir'd, presented themselves with silk lines in their hands, and went respectfully to offer silver hooks to him that receiv'd the offerings. After them two hundred others, attir'd with fillets, and crown'd with sea-weed, went to present every one a fish, in baskets of bulrush covered with flowers; after them a hundred daughters of Fishermen, attir'd in green, and their hair dishevel'd like Sea-Nymphs, carried little baskets full of cockles, and offer'd them to Neptune. Then came a hundred old Mariners with Oars painted and adorn'd with Flowers, which they carried and laid down at the foot of Neptune's statue, to testify by that submission, that it was he that sav'd them from suffering shipwrack. When all these offerings were made, the accustomed sacrifice was perform'd, after which was heard a concert of voices, which sung a hymn in praise of Neptune, which Hesiod had compos'd

this year, and was accounted so admirable, that never had any comparable, to it, been sung before. While it was singing, and all the rest of the multitude was in profound silence, there was on a sudden heard a strange kind of noise among them that stood furthest off, with a great murmur and confusion of voices. A moment after, the throng was divided, and there were seen four Fishermen, bringing a dead man all bloody upon Oars laid across, who having found him in this condition, not far from the place where the River Daphnus discharges it self into the sea near Molycria, brought him hither where this great assembly of people was, to the end it might be known who he was. This lamentable object troubled the Assembly; but it afflicted the fair Clymene much more sensibly, who after the men had laid the body upon the ground, perceiv'd the Dog she had given to Hesiod amongst the Fishermen, and going to lye down upon the Corps, which she instantly knew to be Troilus, that faithful Slave of Hesiod; for the Scaffold whereon she stood was sufficiently near, and his attire remarkable, not to be unknown or mistaken. She no sooner knew him, but she made a great shriek; a moment after, a thousand voices forc'd her to turn her eyes towards the Sea, where the people imagin'd Neptune was ready to appear, because they perceiv'd the water rise up after an extraordinary manner, with something moving in it, which they could not well discern. Clymene's mind being then very inquieted with seeing the Slave of her dear Hesiod, in this condition, look'd upon this commotion in the Sea as others did, though her thoughts were wholly otherwise employ'd. Thus she stood and beheld, as all the rest of the World did, that this object which appear'd so confusedly, coming nearer and nearer, became more visible every moment. So that insensibly approaching it was perceiv'd to be a great Troop of Dolphins, who carried a body upon their backs by turns, discharging the burden from one to another, as they drew nearer towards the shoar. This object surpris'd the whole multitude in such manner, that it fix'd the eyes of all the company from the Prince to the meanest Fisher; but especially of Clymene, who no sooner perceiv'd it, but, without well knowing the reason of it, she was seiz'd with such a universal trembling, as fear gives them who are most capable of it. In the mean time these charitable Dolphins approaching always towards the shore, mutually aiding one another, came at length so near it, that they cast the body, which they had carried, upon the Bank, and that so gently, that it remain'd extended upon the Gravel, as if it had been a man asleep, having his countenance turn'd towards Heaven, after which they plung'd themselves again into the Sea, and departed from the shore. But this body was no sooner upon the Land, but the Dog which lay upon that of Troilus run to the shore, and howling in a most doleful manner, laid himself down upon the body which the Dolphins had brought thither. Clymene, who beheld the action of this Dog, first trembled with fear, and then suddenly blush'd again; and advancing towards the side of the Scaffold which look'd towards the Sea, she heard several voices which said, It was the body of Hesiod, which was seen upon the Bank. Whereupon, resenting a passion not

not to be express'd, and not being Mistress of her self, she stretcht out her hand to a man who help'd her down the Scaffold, and was follow'd by Belintha through the throng to the place where the body lay. But coming thither, she beheld her dear Hesiod dead, who having receiv'd a great wound in the Throat with a Sword, seem'd to have been assassinated. At the same instant Antiphanes and Ganetor, by the Prince's order, approaching towards the body, to the end they might ascertain him whose it was, came thither at the same moment that the unfortunate Clymene did. But as soon as they appear'd, the Dog which she had given Hesiod, and who then lay upon his body, leapt up with an extream fury, sometimes against Antiphanes, and sometimes against Ganetor, as if he would fly in their faces, and accuse them of the death of his Master, which Clymene observing, and all the people looking upon it as something prodigious, and perceiving the wounds of Hesiod begin to bleed afresh, and Antiphanes and Ganetor appearing astonish'd at it, Clymene could not contain her self from saying in the transport of her grief, turning towards her friend who was near her; Ah! my dear Belintha, I see not only Hesiod dead, but I see also that they which murder'd him are my brothers. After, this fair and afflicted Lady being able to speak no more, resenting such an excess of grief, that she fell down in a swoon near the body of Hesiod. Belintha fate down by her, and holding her in her arms, did all she could to revive her. In the mean time the people having heard what Clymene said, comparing her words with the action of that faithful Dog of Hesiod, did not doubt but Antiphanes and Ganetor had murder'd him; besides that, they appear'd so astonish'd, that their countenances accus'd them. Now Hesiod having been very well belov'd, and the people having newly heard a Hymn of his composing in the honor of Neptune, wherewith they were very much affected, believ'd they could do nothing more acceptable to the God, whose Festival they celebrated, than to sacrifice to him the Murderers of him, who had so excellently sung his glory. Whereupon, the Brothers of Clymene endeavour'd to return towards the Prince; but the multitude setting upon them, strangely treated and affronted them. It being not the custom to wear Arms, during the Solemnity of this Sacrifice, there was no difficulty in laying hold upon these two execrable murderers: who, instead of justifying themselves, desir'd they might be led to the Prince, and that the People would protect them from the violence of those that set upon them; but alledging the Prince would punish them for offering to revenge the death of a man whom he had banish'd, they made their own conviction evident. Whereupon the people crying out, it was fit to kill them, otherwise Neptune would be incens'd: This revenge becoming a zeal of Religion, it was impossible for the Prince or the Priest to rescue them from being torn in pieces by the multitude, and cast into the Sea. The unfortunate Clymene hearing the cry on every side, They are dead, and Hesiod reveng'd, understood her Brothers were put to death, after having slain her dear Hesiod; for it was presently known by some Shepherds, who had seen it, that these ambitious Brothers had murder'd him with Troilus, upon the Bank of the River Daphnus, near the place where it falls into the Sea; that afterwards they had thrown the two bodies into the Sea, one of which was cast up again by the waves upon the shore, and the other brought by the Dolphins near the Cape of Rium. The Prince hearing Clymene was near the body of Hesiod, went thither to her, after he had dispers'd all the incensed multitude, who so well reveng'd the death of Hesiod, that they pull'd down a house standing not far off, which belong'd to Antiphanes and Ganetor. But as soon as Clymene perceiv'd the Prince, she shut her eyes that she might not see him, and making a sign to him with her hand to retire, turn'd her head towards the other side, and swoon'd with grief in the arms of Belintha. This sad accident so affected the Prince of Locri, that fearing his presence might occasion the death of Clymene, if he should continue near her, he intreated Belintha to take care of her, and retir'd. In the mean time, partly out of policy, and partly out of generosity, he commanded the body of Hesiod to be interr'd near a Temple of Nemaa, in the Countrey of Locri, which stood in the midst of a Wood; to the end it might be less in the sight of the people, and that the remembrance of his death might be the sooner worn out. Thus the Oracle which had formerly admonish'd Hesiod to beware of the Temple of Nemaa, was accomplish'd, though Hesiod forsook Peloponnesus, that he might be at greater distance from the Temple of Nemaa, which is seen there. Belintha, after the body of Hesiod was remov'd from thence, caus'd Clymene to come again to her self, and put her into a Chariot, into which her self and her Aunt likewise enter'd and commanded him that drove it, to go to a house of hers, which stood thirty Furlongs from thence. But, upon the way, whatever Consolations were us'd to Clymene, she answer'd nothing but, Hesiod is dead for my sake, and I will dye for his. And accordingly this fair Virgin, who till then, imagin'd her self still upon the Sea-shore, near the body of Hesiod (so troubled was her mind, observing at length she was in a Chariot, and no longer saw her dear Hesiod) believ'd they were carrying her to Locri, where the Prince would continue to importune her. Upon which, making a great shriek, Ah! no, no, (said she) it shall never be said, that I live after my dear Hesiod, and go to a place where he can be no more. And immediately, as if she had had the command of her Fates, she fell down in so great a swoon, that they were forc'd to stop the Chariot. Yet their succor to her was in vain, for she expir'd in the Arms of her Aunt, and her Friend, who were ready to dye with grief as well as she. But at length, seeing their tears were unprofitable, they continued on their way in the most sad manner imaginable. They had scarce gone five hundred paces into a Wood, but Lysicrates, without knowing any thing of what had happened, came attended with several Horsemen to stop the Chariot, with intention to carry away Clymene, and to put her into a Ship, which he had provided for that purpose. But how strangely was he surpriz'd, when, instead of living Clymene, he beheld the fair Clymene dead? Come, Lysicrates, come, (said Belintha to him, who knew his design) come see the fatal consequences of your ambition! For

if you had never been ambitious, Clymene had been still alive, her Brother and Hesiod would not have been dead, nor your self culpable and exil'd; but you would have been as happy as I foresee you will be miserable, for it is not possible you should be otherwise, after having caus'd so many miseries. Ah! Belinthus (cry'd Lyfiscrates, alighting from his Horse, and approaching to her) that which you say is too true, and I too criminal to be excus'd. But death (added this despairing Lover) shall without doubt punish me for my crimes; for since I am the cause of that of the most excellent person that ever was, I am unworthy to live. And indeed to increase my despair, (continued he) I will believe the unfortunate Clymene did not love Hesiod, but only out of revenge, and that it must be imputed to me whatsoever she has suffer'd by her affection to him. But since it is not possible for us to live together, yet at least we must reside in the same tomb, and all I have acquir'd by my ambition, shall be employ'd in that Structure. Which fatal thought coming in an instant into Lyfiscrates's mind, Belinthus and Clymene's Aunt endeavour'd to divert him from it; but in vain: for having a Chariot in that Wood, in which he had design'd to carry away Clymene to the Sea-side, which is not far distant from it, where a ship attended for him; he caus'd the body of Clymene to be taken by his followers, notwithstanding the tears and cries of these Ladies, and himself helpt respectfully to lift it into his Chariot. After which, he caus'd it to be put into his ship, and setting sail with all speed, cross'd the Ionian Sea, which is on the West side of Peloponnesus, and landed not far from the place where the River, which passes by the City of Elis, discharges it self into the Sea; and commanding Clymene's body to be carried into a Temple of Diana, which was near the Bank of that River, he perform'd to her, all the honors of Sepultures, which being done, he gave himself wholly to bewail her death, and caus'd a stately Tomb to be built for her, in building of which, he, according to his promise, bestow'd all the riches his ambition had gain'd him, reserving only enough for his subsistence during that time: and as soon as the Tomb was finish'd, the unhappy Lover shut himself up in it, and dy'd for grief, in having been the cause of so many fatal accidents; though others have believ'd ambition had as great a share in his death as Love. Thus Clymene was reveng'd after her death; but she had not the sad happiness to be in the same Tomb with Hesiod, who has had a glory transcending that of all others; for the Orchomenians having consulted an Oracle, which promis'd them much felicity, if they could get the body of Hesiod into their power, they of Locri to hinder them from it, so carefully conceal'd the place of his Sepulture from strangers, that there are few persons know it. And moreover the Prince of Locri dying of Melancholly not long after, the Locrians augmented the honors which they paid to Hesiod's memory, whose very name intimates in his own language how purely he writ, and whose glory is so celebrated throughout the whole World, that it may be justly thought, it will be so in all Ages.

rymuch affected with it, and that instead of delighting the company, he had afflicted them. In truth (said Clelia) the death of Clymene affects me very sensibly. For my part (said Valefia), I have a greater commiseration of Hesiod, than I am able to express. I have the like for Lyfiscrates (added Clydamira.) I am not of your opinion, (answered Berelisa) for I never have any pity for those that have once ceas'd to love, though that Passion revive again in their hearts; and I compassionate only Hesiod and Clymene. My commiseration goes farther than yours (said Salonina;) for I pity poor Troilus too. But mine is yet greater than that you boast of, (answer'd Plotina smiling) for I am almost dead for fear, lest that poor Dog, so faithful to his Master, after having discover'd his Murderers, be lost in the multitude of people, or died of grief, after having lost both his Master and his Mistress. All the company laugh'd at the pity of Plotina, and went forth to walk in several troops, except Clelia, Valerius, Plotina, Anacreon, Herminius and Amilcar, who began to assault Plotina with raillery for her pity to Hesiod's dog. No, no, (interrupted Anacreon) do not set upon her with your jests for it; perhaps her pity of that poor Dog, has a more real foundation than ours, for the death of Clymene; for to speak sincerely, though I am both a Greek and a Poet, and am somewhere mention'd in the Prophecies of Apollo, which you have read, yet I cannot but believe, but the History you have read, is almost all of it invented. Yet it is contriv'd ingeniously enough, (added he) for methinks, 'tis not only handsomer than the truth, but withal, more probable. History mentions nothing more of Hesiod, than that he dwelt at the Town of Arcra in Baotia, near Helicon, that the Muses inspir'd him, and that an Oracle which spoke to him, admonish'd him to avoid the Temple of Nemæa, which is in Peloponnesus; that he travell'd into divers places, that he obtain'd the Golden Tripod, and that he got advantage over Homer, in the judgement of Pan.

There are some who affirm these two persons did not live at the same time: however, all that have written of Hesiod, agree that he was at Locri, and content themselves to say, in three words, that he lodg'd at the house of Antiphanes and Ganctor; who had a Sister, and suspecting him to be the confidant of a Lover of hers, killed him together with his slave; that the body of the slave was found at a Cape or Promontory, which was afterwards call'd by the name of Troilus, in reference to him; that the body of Hesiod was brought by Dolphins near a Temple of Neptune, where a great sacrifice was solemnizing; that Hesiod's dog occasion'd the discovery of his murderers, who were torn in pieces by the people; and that for fear the Orchomenians should get away his body, they conceal'd the place of his burial. As for his Works, he that invented this History, has fictitiously ascrib'd to him only the Sonnet, the four Verses which he relates Hesiod to have spoken, and the Hymn which he makes him Author of for Neptune's Sacrifice. Now it cannot but be acknowledged, that fiction in this occasion has greater verisimilitude, than truth it self. When the purpose is to bring about extraordinary events, it is no question handsomer to introduce lover in them than than any other cause: which has been practis'd by the inventor of this History; for by feigning the love of the Prince of Locri, Lyfcrates, Hefiode, and Clymene, he has made you know all these different persons; and oblig'd you to love them, which were to be the most unfortunate. In the next place, he has given probability to that which carry'd not much with it; for there is far more likelihood, that two ambitious and wicked Brothers, should be led to kill a man, whom they look'd upon as an obstacle to their advancement, by hindring their Sister from being favourable to a Prince, from whom they expected the making of their fortunes, than to kill him as a confident of their Sisters Lover; for, setting one crime against another, it was better to kill the Lover than the Confident. He has likewise had reason to suppose Hefiode Author of that Hymn of Neptune; for besides that, such a kind of composition is sufficiently suitable to his strain, it was a means to conciliate the peoples affection to him, who had newly heard those Verses sung: and it seems some such extraordinary cause was requisite, to induce the people to that extraordinary action; It was also pertinent to make his wounds bleed afresh at the presence of the murderers, and to represent Clymene so transported, as to accuse her brothers, without thinking to do it; for otherwise the people would have been very inconsiderate, to tear those two men in pieces, only because Hefiod's dog set upon them. Wherefore I conceive a man that should have invented that which the History speaks concerning this adventure, had done incongruously; but he that compos'd the Fable Amilcar has read over, has made one according to the rules of Art. In truth (said Herminius) he has made good use of all that History supply'd him with: and I am wholly dispos'd to believe, that if it was not so, it is possible to have been so: since nothing more commends a well-invented Fable, than those historical foundations which are interweav'd throughout in it, and cause the Fiction to be receiv'd together with the truth. But to speak unfeignedly, 'tis more difficult than is believ'd, to mingle those two together aright: for they must be so handsomely blended, as not to be discerned one from another, and that which is invented, must generally seem more likely than the true: for Chance indeed may bring such things about as are incredible, but it is not lawful for a man to invent such as cannot be believ'd. If all that I have heard (said Plotina) be not true, I require Amilcar to restore me the tears which I have shed, or invent some other History as delightful as this is melancholly, or at least to describe how an invented History ought to be made, so as to be good: for, as for my part (added she agreeably) were I to invent a History, I think I should make things much more perfect than they are. All Women should be admirably fair, and all Men should be as valiant as Heſtor, all my Heroes should slay at least a hundred men in every battle, I would build Palaces of precious stones, I would make Prodigies fall out every moment, and without troubling my self to invent with judgement, I should suffer my fancy to act as it pleased; so that seeking out only surprising events, without examining, whether they were consistent to reason or no, I should certainly make very extraordinary things; a continual Shipwracks, burning of Cities, and a thousand other like accidents, which occasion handsome lamentations and descriptions. Plotina spoke this with a certain sprightly air, which made it apparent, she knew sufficiently, what she said, was not that which ought to be done, and that she only design'd to draw Anacreon, Herminius, and Amilcar to speak, who no doubt were able to speak excellently upon this Subject. And accordingly she obtain'd the end she propos'd to her self: for Anacreon not knowing her yet sufficiently to be acquainted with all the ingenious subtilty she made profession of, turning towards her, and beholding her with a smile; Should you invent a History after the manner you speak of, amiable Plotina, (said he) you would do a thing no doubt sufficiently strange; for with rare Events, wonderful Descriptions, heroical Actions, extraordinary Matters, and Palaces of precious Stones, you would make one of the lewdest Fables that can be possibly invented; there being without doubt nothing worse, than to see things of this nature made without order and reason: Is there any thing imaginable more strange, than when 'tis in ones power to make such events fall out as he pleases, yet to introduce such as can never possibly arrive? But yet (said Plotina) how comes it to be so, and wherein is my opinion so absurd? Because (answer'd Anacreon) when you invent a Fable, your purpose is to be believ'd, and the true art of Fiction is handsomely to resemble truth. For when this rule is deserted, there is no longer any difficulty in any thing whatsoever, and there is no more proper occasion to display the wit, than to invent without judgement. For my part (said Clelia) I well understand what Anacreon speaks; for certainly things which have resemblance with truth, and seem possible to happen, affect far more, than those which cannot either be believ'd or fear'd. But if an Historian of this kind (answer'd Valeria) never relates things but such as appear to be true, and are of ealie belief, methinks his composures will be extream vulgar, and not much delightful. You are upon a tender point, Valeria (reply'd Amilcar) for in disallowing things incredible and impossible, it is not intended to imploy only such as are mean and common; there is a third way to be taken, which is the most delightful of all, and most reasonable. Wonderful accidents are so far from being forbidden, that they are necessary, provided they do not happen too often, and produce handsome effects; only odd and impossible things are absolutely condemned. For 'tis the occasion of disparaging the credit of the whole, when one thing is presented that surpasses belief. When any Slave of mine has told me a lye but once, I afterwards suspect all that he tells me; judge then if I can believe a man, who should recount extraordinary adventures to me, which my reason cannot consider as possible. So that impossible things, and such as are low and common, must almost equally be avoided, and such ways of invention follow'd, as are at once both strange and natural; for without this last quality, no wonder can please a reasonable person. I conceive, (answer'd Herminius) whosoever will invent such such kind of adventures, as may both instruct and delight, he ought to consider all the World in general, as a Painter beholds his Pattern when he is at work. And as diversity or variety is the Soul of the World, he ought to take heed of making all men Heroes, all Women equally fair, the dispositions and humors of all particular persons alike and correspondent, and Love, Anger, Jealousie, Hatred, to produce always the same effects. On the contrary, he must imitate that admirable variety, which is seen in all men, according to the example of Homer. Which is not unknown to two Ladies I see here present; for there is seen so great a variety of representations in his Works, that 'tis not one of the things which makes me most admire him. Those two Lovers, who, in the beginning of their contest with one another, about a Captive Virgin, being of different tempers, act also after a different manner; and though they are both possess'd with the same passion, do not take the same course. There is seen in Paris, a representation of disorderly love, in which Virtue has no part; in Hector and Andromache, an Idea of virtuous love; in Patroclus and Achilles, one of Heroical friendship, and the better to understand this variety of Characters wherewith Homer has adorn'd his Works, it needs only to take notice in general, of Agamemnon, Nestor, Achilles, Ulysses, Ajax, Menelaus, Diomedes, Paris, Helen, Hector, Andromache, Priam, Penelope, and of so many others, even to the pleasant Characters, as that of Thirsis, which is so particularly excellent, But 'tis moreover worth observation, that the persons which Homer introduces, are presently known and familiar to the Readers, because they always act according to the temper he attributes to them. Wherefore heed must be taken not to confound these different Characters: but above all things, the nature of the passions ought necessarily to be understood, and what they work in the hearts of those who are possess'd with them, after having describ'd them for such and such persons: for every one has his manner of loving according to his own humor. You have reason (answer'd Plotina) and I begin to conceive well what you say: but since any one may invent a History, why is it not lawful to invent all things, and to suppose such Countreys as are no where in the World; for it would spare much pains. 'Tis true (reply'd Anacreon) but it would also diminish much of the pleasure, if such places and persons only were us'd as were never heard of, there would be the less curiosity in the minds of the Readers to know them: and the imagination finding all things new, would be inclin'd to doubt of all; whereas on the contrary, when an Age is made choice of, which is not so remote, but that some particularities of it are known, not so near, as that all the passages of it be too well understood, which notwithstanding is so between both; that events may be introduc'd in it, which an Historian may probably have been ignorant of, or ought not to have related; there is more conveniency to make handsomer things than if all were invented. For when names of Countreys are employed, which all the World hears of, and wherewith Geography is exactly acquainted; and when great events are made use of, which are sufficiently known, the mind is wholly dispos'd to suffer itself to be seduc'd, and to receive the fiction together with the truth, provided it be handsomly interwoven, and the Writer take pains to study the Age well he makes choice of, to improve all the rarities of it, and to conform to the customs of places he treats of, not to mention Laurels in Countreys where there was never any seen, not to confound the Religions or Customs of Nations that are introduc'd; though they may with judgement be a little drawn to the usage of the present age, to the end they may be the more delightful; I am confident if this be observ'd, and they which are introduc'd in a Fable of this nature, speak well, the passions be well painted out, the adventures be natural and prudently invented, all the little matter which discover the bottom of mens hearts, be pertinently plac'd; Vice be blam'd, Virtue rewarded, and Variety dispers'd through the whole, without confusion, if the fancy be always subject to the judgement, extraordinary events be rationally grounded; if there be knowledge, without affectation, delight, ornament, and pleasantness, wherever it is necessary; if the style be neither too high nor too low, and no violence offer'd to decency and good manners; I am confident, I say, such a Work will please all that read it, be more delightful to them than a History, and withal be more profitable. For a person who writes the History of a Prince, can blame only the vices of him whose life he writes: but he that undertakes to compose an ingenious Fable, may take occasion, if he please, to condemn all Vices, and teach all Virtues. And therefore I wish, with all my heart, Herminius and Amilcar would set about a composition of this nature. As for Amilcar (answer'd Clelia) I must dissuade him from it; for according to the humor he is of, he will never be able to resolve to blame inconsistency: but for Herminius, who makes profession of being constant, and knows all virtues, I wish he would take the pains to do it. I assure you (reply'd he) I should gladly undertake it, if I believ'd I could do it as well as I apprehend it might be done; for I am perswaded a Map of the World, and that a little embellish'd, would be a very delightful thing, and withal very profitable. But to speak freely, the undertaking is more difficult than it seems, and I believe it is easier to write a handsome History, than to compose an accurate Fable, after the manner I apprehend it may be made. Yet it is requisite an Historian have great accomplishments; he must have a wit of great extent which his fancy must adorn when it is needful, both which his judgement must guide and restrain, when 'tis convenient, and his memory ought never to be unfaithful to him. He must have an universal knowledge of the World, of the interest of Princes, and the humors of Nations; policy must not be unknown to him, nor the art of War; he must understand to describe battels; and, which is most of all necessary, he must be able perfectly to represent those Wars of the Closet, which are met with in all Courts, which consist in intrigues, delusions, and negotiations, true or feign'd, and which notwithstanding are of such importance, that 'tis in them the seeds are sown of the most considerable Wars, and

and on which the ruine or felicity of Nations, as well as the verity of History depends. It is requisite also to be skilful, how to represent the different passions of Princes, as those which govern; not to say too much, or too little of them, and never to write any thing, but what instructs or delights, and is either good or pleasant. However when a man is provided with faithful memorials, has liv'd himself in the world, and has part of the qualities necessary to an Historian, 'tis easie to make a History not wholly bad. But to compose an accurate Fable, adorn'd with all that can render it agreeable or profitable, I conceive it necessary, not only to have all that I said was requisite to an Historian, but to have a hundred knowledges more comprehensive and particular. Such a Writer must be (as I may so speak) the Creator of his Work; he must understand the art of setting forth Virtue, and exhibiting it as a thing not difficult to be practis'd. He must know the World, not only as the Author of a History ought, but he must understand the handsome mode of the World perfectly, politeness of conversation, the art of ingenious raillery, and that of making innocent Satyrs; nor must he be ignorant of that of composing of Verses, writing Letters, and making Orations. He must also know (as I may so speak) the secrets of all hearts, and be ignorant of not one of all the commendable Sciences; of which occasion may be sometimes offer'd to speak by the way. But above all things, he must know how to take away plainness and driness from Morality, and set it off in a dress so natural and so agreeable, that it may divert all those to whom it gives instruction; and as Ladies break not their Looking-glasses which show them the defects which they amend when they know; so they may not hate a Work wherein they oftentimes see things which none durst speak to them of, and which they would never speak of to themselves. Whence it is easie to judge, that it is much more difficult to make a Work of this nature, than to write a History. You discourse admirably well (answer'd Anacreon). I am of your opinion (added Amilcar): but that which seems strange to me, is, that if it were possible to find one that had compos'd a Fable of this nature, yet there would also be found a great number of people, who would speak of it but as of a meer trifle, and an unprofitable amusement: and I know divers ancient Senators here, and also several Roman Matrons, who would be so affrighted with a Love-story, that they would absolutely forbid their Children from casting their eye upon any such. That conceit, (answer'd Herminius) seems very unjust; for Love is not learnt in Books, nature teaches it all men; and in all places through which I have travell'd, I have found love every where: But I have found it more gross, brutish, and criminal, amongst people of no politeness, and such as are wholly ignorant of handsome gallantry, than amongst persons of worth and civil education. And besides, if it were unfit to read Books wherein Love is treated of, we must forbear reading of Histories, in which we find examples of all crimes, and wherein oftentimes the Criminals are happy, and cause desire in some to imitate them. One day, History will record the abominable action of Sexsus, the miserable death of Servius Tullus, the unjust Loves of Tarquin and Tullia, and a thousand other things of dangerous example; which need not be in a Fable according to the way I understand; for therein modesty may always be join'd with love, and no criminal loves be ever related, which prove not in the end unhappy. For my part (said Clelia,) I think it more important than is believ'd, to shew that there may be innocent loves and delightful together, for there are but too many who think this can never be. No doubt, Madam, you have reason (answer'd Herminius) wherefore those good Senators, and severe Matrons are too blame for hindring their Children from reading a Work wherein they might find wherewith to understand the practice of all Virtues, and by the advantages of which they might spare the pains of travelling, to become persons of worth and accomplisht; since there may be made so handsome a Map of the World, that it might be seen in Epitome, without going forth of their Closet. And as for Ladies, I conceive likewise that the reading of such a Work as I am speaking of, would rather hinder them from admitting of Gallants, than induce them to entertain them; for if they would compare the love pretended to them, with that they found describ'd in a Book of this Nature, they would apprehend so much difference between them, that they would never suffer themselves to be mov'd with it. I add moreover confidently, that such a Book might not only teach all Virtues, blame all Vices, and reprove all the little defects the World is full of, but it might also teach to reverence the gods, by the example given in the persons of Heroes, propos'd for a pattern; and that of whatever Nation or Religion the Reader be of, he might be profited by it. For when I behold a Roman adore the gods of his Countrey, I am not backward to improve by the example, (though I am an African) and thereby to remember I ought to worship those of my own Countrey. Therefore I do not weigh the morosity of some unreasonable people, who blame a Work of this nature; but at the venture of undergoing their injustice, I wish I were the Author of one. For I, being contented with my own intention, should comfort myself against the severity of a few persons with the general applauses of the World, and the peculiar knowledge I had of the profitableness of this kind of Work in which may be had experience without the assistance of old age, precepts without severity, innocent Satyrs, judgement which costs nothing, and the means to learn that art of the World, without which it is impossible ever to be acceptable. If you make one (said Plotina) I promise you to read it with pleasure: For my part (added Clelia) I promise my admiration to Herminius. I promise him more than you (added Valeria) for I promise him to reform many defects which I have. For what concerns me (said Anacreon) I engage myself to sing his glory. And for my part (answer'd Amilcar) I promise him to read it with delight, to esteem it highly, to commend it in all places, and to do nothing which he shall say, for I never do any thing but what I say to myself.

And

And besides, he has such an inclination to constant love, that I should never conform to it. After this, all the company uniting again, the Musick began, and then the Collation was serv'd, which was as magnificent as the harmony was melodious; after which the conversation was extremely agreeable. But it being sufficiently late, the company separated themselves with the sorrow of knowing they should lose Telanus the next morning, because the Figure which the Veien-

tines were to deliver, was to arrive at Rome the day following. Clelia indeed was exempted from this discontent, though she very highly esteem'd Telanus, because thinking of nothing but what might have some correspondence with the passion she had in her Soul, she only mus'd upon the death of Hesiodè, imagining what grief she should resent, if during the War which was beginning between Porfenna and Rome, her dear Aronces should happen to perish in it,

CLELIA.

A New Romance.

The Fourth PART.

The Third BOOK.

THE people of Rome understanding, the figure made at Veii by Tarquin's command, was arriv'd, testified an extream joy thereupon. Nothing so easily communicating it self as superstition in the minds of the Multitude. The Consul Horatius in the absence of Publicola, caus'd the figure to be plac'd in the Temple of Jupiter, and gave permission to Telanus to return. So that having no pretext to continue longer at Rome, he was constrain'd to depart from thence, and take leave of those illustrious persons, with whom he had pass'd some dayes so delightfully. 'Tis true, he left his heart with the aimable Plotina, and return'd with his mind so fill'd with the excellency of his Lady, that as courageous as he was, he heartily wish'd the war would soon be ended. He parted from Antilcat with much dearness, notwithstanding his being his Rival; but for the three other his Rivals, he bid them not adieu. His civility was greater towards Clelia, to whom he made a thousand protestations of friendship, as likewise to Ottavius, who being better recover'd, had a long conversation with him before his departure, to oblige him to serve Aronces to the utmost of his power, since he was going to be of the same Party, intreating him to be confident, that if he could find occasion of seeing him, he would promote his interests faithfully with Clelius, and against Horatius. After which this generous Veientine having thanked Clelius for all the favours he had received from him, departed from Rome, where the same day there arriv'd news which was not very acceptable. For intelligence was brought, that Porfenna was so diligent in assisting Tarquin, that in a little time the troops of Veii and Tarquinia, would be united with his; and that he had resolv'd to be in person in the head of his Army. It was also inform'd that Publicola would return within three dayes, because having been advertiz'd by Herminius, that there was beginning of division in the Senate since his departure, he judg'd it more important to take care for the assuring of Rome, than to preserve the out-places of it. Besides his Army being too weak to undertake to sustain the first attempt of that of the King of Heituria, when the Forces of the Veientines, and those of Tarquin should be added to it, he thought it better to let the Enemies cool and weaken themselves, before he offer'd to fight them. The vertue of Publicola being highly respected by all the Romans, the news of his return produc'd a good effect in Rome. They who had begun to divide themselves reunited, and had not the boldness but to appear zealous for their Country, before a man, who had no other interest, and who, having all the People at his devotion, might easily punish them for their delinquency. The return of Publicola was no doubt very acceptable to Valeria; but Mutius coming back with him, diminish'd part of her joy; because he had such a kind of haughtiness in his deportment, that she had rather this imperious Lover would alwayes have been at the war, than return'd to Rome. The forces being also to come back, Clidamirs and Berelisa thought fit to defer their journey to Præneste, till the return of the Army: and moreover Artemidorus being at Rome, they had no great impatience to leave it. But as for this Prince, he ardently wish'd Berelisa had been there alone, having scarce any opportunity of seeing her without Clidamirs; for which reason he took no delight in seeing her, and was more frequently with Clelia than with her; for this aimable Lady looking upon him as Aronces's friend, and a wife, good and discreet Prince, to whom she might communicate all the secrets of her soul, had very much affection and complacency for him. As they were one day together, a Slave of Artemidorus brought him a Letter, which oblig'd him to take leave of her, without telling her the cause of it. Tho the same night he return'd to her, to beseech her she would please to take a walk the next day with Valeria, Cesonia, and Plotina, in a Garden not far from the Sublician bridge. Clelia not caring for divertisement, desir'd to be excus'd; but Artemidorus telling her the business was to do a good office to Valeria, and that he could not discover more of it to her, she promis'd she would be ready when Cesonia, Valeria, and Plotina should come to call her, knowing Suspicia would not refuse to let her go with those Ladies, her dear friends. And accordingly the next morning, they whom Artemidorus had nam'd, came to her house, there being no men in the company besides Artemidorus and Herminius. As they were going to the Garden, Clelia ask'd Valeria what service she desir'd of her? I should rather (answer'd she) desire to know what I may do for your service; for Artemidorus has told me you had need of me in relation to some affair. It is to be believ'd then (reply'd Clelia) that 'tis he that has need of us: but, in reference to my self I cannot but think him too blame for taking such a course, since I should serve him with joy. In my opinion (said Valeria) it must be for something which Berelisa is concern'd. Then they ask'd Cesonia and Plotina, if they knew what the bufiness was, which occasioned their going to that Garden. For my part (answered the first) I know no more of it, but that Artemidorus told me you both desir'd me to accompany you thither, and to take Plotina with me. 'Tis some satisfaction to me (said Clelia) that we shall soon know what the business is with us. When these Ladies were arriv'd at the gate of that garden, where Artemidorus and Herminius waited for them, they lighted from their Chariot, and entered into the Garden, where they found no person at all; wherefore they demanded what was the design of their coming thither. Be not impatient (answered he) you shall know it presently; but you shall not know altogether, but severally, what has induc'd me to deceive you, and bring you hither; at least Clelia and Valeria shall be together in one place, whilst Cesonia and Plotina shall be in another. If Artemidorus had not been well known to these four persons, this would have occasion'd strange thoughts in them: but being ascertain'd how prudent and discreet he was, their curiosity did not inquiet their minds at all. But (said Plotina) I desire to be satisfied, whether Herminius be more knowing than we are; He shall be so presently (answered Artemidorus) for he shall know all, that shall be told Clelia and Valeria, tho not till after them. For my part (said Herminius) I desire never to know any thing concerning my friends, but what they are willing I should. After this Artemidorus having been to give order that none should be admitted into the Garden, led Cesonia and Plotina into a walk which was on the far side, where they found an old man, who no sooner beheld Plotina, but he knew her, altho it was a very long time since he had seen her. But this fair Virgin could not know him otherwise than by his voice, and was some time before she could recollect her self. At length calling him to mind, she testified much joy to see him, and believing he was her Uncle, made him a thousand caresses; Alas! (said she to him, embracing him) where have you been for so long time? You shall know (answered he) when I have opportunity to tell you without any other witness than Cesonia, to whom I know you have such great obligations, that 'tis fit she be acquainted with all your fortune. Alas! (reply'd Plotina) my fortune is very easie to know; for when I have said I have lost my father and my mother, while I was yet in the cradle, and alwayes liv'd with the vertuous Agesile your wife, till my departure from Ardea, I shall have said almost all. You so little know your self (answered this sage old man) that you cannot well speak of your self, till after I have told you who you are. Artemidorus judging that his presence was not necessary in this place, and knowing that it was elsewhere, left Cesonia and Plotina with him that had so many important things to tell them, and returned to Clelia, Valeria, and Herminius. But to accomplish his design, he intreated Herminius to stay with him, and desir'd those two persons that they would please to go a side into a little Garden separated from the great one, where there was a little knot of flowers, enclos'd with pales and myrtles. So that these two fair virgins seeing there was no great danger in doing what Artemidorus desir'd, enter'd into it. Which they had no sooner done, but they beheld Aronces appear, coming forth of a little Arbor at a corner of the Garden. This sight surpris'd them strangely, but especially Clelia, who in the first instant resented nothing but joy in seeing her dear Aronces. Who, as soon as he beheld her, saluted her very respectfully, and approacht towards her with all the transport that a true love can cause in a Lover, whose heart is tender and sensible, when he again sees the Person he loves, after a long absence. I have at length, Madam, (said he to her) in spite of all the obstacles that oppose my happiness, at least the satisfaction of being able to tell you all my misfortunes, and to understand from your mouth, what you will command me to do. Being assur'd Valeria knows all the secrets of your heart, that she is generous, good and faithful, I have been willing she should know I am here; for tho I have the unhappiness to have a father who is Tarquin's Protector, yet, I think, I ought not to be suspected by her. You have reason my Lord (answered that discreet Virgin) not to be distrustful of me; for I have so high an esteem of your virtue, that excepting Clelia, there is no person in the world was more affected with your loss than my self; and indeed (added she) I see already so much fright upon Clelia's countenance, for seeing you so near Rome, where you have more violent enemies than you believe, that I cannot but fear lest you should be seen. And therefore whilst you are speaking with Clelia, it will be convenient for me to take care that you be not perceiv'd. Clelia would have withheld her; but she retir'd back to the gate, where Artemidorus and Herminius were discoursing together, and from whence she might see, but not hear them. As soon as she was at a convenient distance, Clelia address'd to him, I confess to you, Aronces, (said she) the first sentiment I had in seeing you, afforded me joy, but alas! my reason begins to destroy it; for my father hates you almost as much as he formerly lov'd you; Horatius loves me more ardently than ever; his Kinsman is the second Consul, and Publicola is not at Rome. My brother no doubt is alwayes for your interests; but my father has so strong a belief it was you that wounded him in the battel, that he cannot indure you should be nam'd in his presence; and when he goes to exaggerate your wounding of his son with the same sword he had given you heretofore, he is so transported against you, that my mother dares not so much as offer to excuse you. I have here understood this unjust accusation by Artemidorus (answered Aronces); but if it were as easie for me to be happy, as it will be to justify my self from it, I should be less to be pity'd than I am. For it was not possible for me to have that sword at the battel, in which I served Rome happily enough, and Octavius was wounded, since Tarquin caus'd me to be put in prison at my departure out of Rome, and it was taken from me; and when I got out of prison, there was no care taken to restore it to me; for I understood the Prince had given it to an Officer who took me. Besides, the sword I had in the battel when I was taken with Horatius, was broken in my hands before I was made prisoner. Thus this accusation falls of it self; and if I had known it sooner, I should have long since been justified in the opinion of Clelia and Octavius. As for my brother (answered she) he has been generous to believe that you wounded him unawares, and to say, it did not belong to the son of Clelius to revenge an injury done to the Prince of Numidia. But, for my father, tho he may be convinc'd, you did not wound my brother, he will not restore you to the place you held in his heart, as long as the King of Meturia shall be Tarquin's Protector, and Rome's enemy. Not but that he speaks things things which seem to have some contrariety; for if you should desert the party of the King your father, and come to side with Rome, he would think the action unworthy of you; and however, when you do all that you ought, he will account you unworthy of me; and to this effect, he speaks to me as often as occasion is presented. But what then must I do (answered Aronces) can I not be the Son of the King of Hetruria? Does it depend on me to cause him to take which side pleases me; Can I be suspected to love Tarquin, to hate so many illustrious Friends as I have at Rome, and not to prefer you above all things? Is it in my power to reverse the Laws and Reason, and to cause Virtue to permit me to bear Arms against the King my Father, and not to bear them against a Rival so courageous and redoubtable as Horatius. I beseech you, Madam, (contin'd he) consider well the state of my fortune, as I am going to represent it to you, and then pronounce absolutely upon it. I know you have a great mind, a heart very noble, and a soul extremely generous; and I will also believe that you love me as much as you can love, tho in a degree infinitely below that in which I love you; therefore I engage my self confidently to do what ever you shall appoint me. But, I beseech you, have some consideration of my glory, as I should have of yours; and if you can find no means to reconcile my love and my honour, and to make me be both innocent and happy, I conjure you command me to die; for death shall be more sweet to me, than the cruel adventure of losing you, or committing a dishonourable action would be. Alas! my Lord, (reply'd Clelia) what do you desire of an unfortunate person? Would you have her counsel you against her own interests? By no means (answered Aronces) for I have none separated from yours; but I desire you would tell me positively what you would have me to do; and especially (added he) do not treat me as the Son of the King of Hetruria; remember the unknown Aronces, and believe you can do nothing more disobliging to me, than to speak as you did but now. I desire your pardon for it (said she to him) but since you will have me tell you what I think, first tell me how you came hither; for I believ'd you still a prisoner. Aronces then obeying Clelia, told her in few words, all that had befallen him since he last saw her, tho she knew a good part of it before. He told her likewise of the visit he had receiv'd from the Queen his Mother, and the Princess of the Leontines, and of the proposition the Queen had made him to feign himself amorous of that Princess; that he might know whether Clelia, who had a scrupulous mind would not take it ill that he consented to it, tho it was only to hinder the King of Ceres's Daughter from being propounded to him in marriage. He added, that, seeing himself in so unhappy a condition, without being able to resolve what he should do, he excited so much pity, in him that guarded him in the Castle whereinto he was put, that tho he hazarded very much to satisfy him, he let him go forth one night upon his word, with an oath to return the third day, at the same hour. But how will your guards (said Clelia) not perceive that you are not in the Castle? By pretending that I am sick, (answer'd he) and that I am not willing to admit any person to see me. And the better to colour the pretence, there is a Slave lies in my bed; and another, who is privy to the business, makes shew of waiting upon me, according to his ordinary custome; and besides he that commands those that guard me, is so much at the devotion of the Queen my Mother, who, he knows, embraces all my interests, that he hazards himself less in obliging me. But in brief, generous Clelia, the main importance is to consider, what I may, and what I ought to do. If I side with Rome, I am an unnatural Son, I ruin my self in the opinions of all persons of honour, and consequently in that of Clelius; I serve my Rival, I defend his life, and fight for his party; but yet I am near you, I see you daily, and dispute the possession of your heart against the merits of my enemies. On the other side, if I serve the King my Father, I do that which virtue and honour obliges me to, and I see my self with thy sword in hand against Horatius; but withal I serve Tarquin and Sextus, whom I hate in perfection, I am an enemy to Clelius and Octavius, my dearest Friends, Virtue, Rome, and to all that is dearest to me; and which is most cruel, I am absent from you, I abandon you in a manner to my Rival, and I have only your constancy to put an obstacle to his happiness. Thus, on which side soever I consider my condition, I am alwayes the most miserable of men. There might be a third course propounded to me; but as for that, Madam, I confess to you, I cannot embrace it, and that it is not possible for me to resolve to continue in prison, without taking one side; and poorly to expect the end of the War, inclos'd within four walls, without doing any thing but against my self and you, whilst Horatius is covering himself with glory, and forcing Clelia to recompence his services. This being so, there are but two things to be examin'd; speak therefore, Madam, and pronounce absolutely what my destiny must be. If I were happy enough to see the King my Father, as equitable in his sentiments for you as the Queen my Mother, I should have other matters to propound to you; but altho a King's Son, I have no assured retreat to offer you any where, tho I were able to perswade you to follow my Fortune. And moreover you have so often told me, you can never render me happy, if Clelius consent not to it, that your virtue supports mine in this occasion. But after all, (added he, transported with the excess of his Love) Why do not we courageously abandon our selves and the interests of Rome, and go to another end of the World, to seek a Sanctuary where we may live together? Our virtue would find us Protectors every where; and if your sentiments were like mine, we would be unhappy in no place, provided our Fortune were inseparable. I beseech you, (answer'd Clelia, discreetly) let us not amuse our selves to speak of a matter, whereof we ought not to think, and which we shall never do. Consider then the two proposals I have made you, (reply'd he) and then tell the unhappy Aronces what you please shall become of him. You know so well (answer'd Clelia) that I will never counsel you to do any thing you may be reproacht for, and which may be prejudicial to you, that you might spare me the grief of telling you my self, that you ought to follow that which reason directs you to; what that is, would be something difficult for me to tell you; and all that I can do, is to conjure you, that when you are in the War, you will remember my Father and my Brother may possibly be amongst the enemies you fight against, that you may avoid meeting them with your sword in your hand; for if by ill Fate you should wound either of them two, you know I cannot without a crime retain any kindness longer for you. Think upon this my dear Aronces, and be generous enough to serve the cruel Tarquin and unjust Sextus with regret; but above all things (added she blushing) when you feign love to the Princess of Leontines, who I am told is very aimable, defend your heart against her charms, and remember whilst you are with her, there is an unfortunate person at Rome, who will treat Horatius ill for your sake, and who is like to be ill treated her self, because she will persist faithful to you. Ah! Madam, (cry'd Aronces) can you think me capable of such a weakness as this? No, (answer'd Clelia) but I can fear it, tho I cannot believe it. That distinction is very nice, (reply'd he) for people use not to fear except that which they can believe, and no person ever much apprehended impossible things. Do not fear therefore, Madam, that I can ever cease to love you, for you shall be alwayes my first and last Mistress; and there is onely glory alone that has any share of my heart with you, tho I am perswaded I should love it much less than I do, If I lov'd not you. Live then with satisfaction in this respect, and suffer me to fear with more reason, that whilst I shall act by constraint as an enemy of Rome, the love of your Country may destroy a love so just and innocent as mine in your heart, and that whilst I am fighting against Horatius, as a redoubtable Rival, he do not get the advantage of me in your affection. He will see you every day, you will hear nothing but vows made against me, all will be dissembled that makes for my advantage, and you will hear no good spoken of the unhappy Aronces, but what you shall speak to your self in seeret. On the contrary, all the actions of the Romans shall be imbellish'd and extoll'd, and especially those of my Rival; so that by degrees it may come to pass, that you may change your sentiments, and I shall be left to die with despair. No, no, my dear Aronces, (answer'd Clelia) do not fear, I will be ever guilty of any inconstancy towards you; or at least do not fear I can ever be capable of loving, after I have lov'd you. But that which afflicts me, is, that I cannot make vows for your party, but shall be enforc'd to make such as are contrary to it; and I doubt also whether strict vertue will permit me to make any for you in particular. However, I am resolv'd I will (added she without giving him leasure to interrupt her) and at the same time that I pray to the Gods Rome may gain the victory, I will beseech them to preserve you, and hinder you from hurting all the persons which ought to be dear to me; and thus accommodating my innocence and my affection the best I can, I shall no doubt lead the unhappiest life in the World. But there is remedy; for as I should not forsake the interest of my Father for your sake, so I will not oblige you to abandon those of yours for mine: Besides, as I told you, it would be no advantage to you with Clelius. Go then my dear Aronces; let us at least have nothing to reproach our selves for; perhaps our Patience will weary our bad Fortune, and oblige the Gods to render us happy. For when I reflect that it is possible for you to be discover'd, and that if the Consul Horatius knew you were here, you would be arrested the next moment, my mind is extremely inquieted. The King of Hetruria would think that you caus'd your self to be arrested, my Father perhaps, would accuse me of having consented to to it, and indeed you would not be very happy to be a prisoner, in a place where I should no more see you, than if you were in the enemies Camp, where you would be prejudiced in all respects, where you would perhaps at last depend on your enemies, and whence you would not be releas'd till the end of the War. Therefore 'tis better for you to be in a place, where you may serve my Father, my Brother, and your Friends, if they happen to become Prisoners to your side, and from whence perhaps I may also sometimes receive tidings from you. You have then absolutely determin'd what my destiny must be (reply'd Aronces). I have not, (answer'd Clelia) but being I can never desire any thing that is unjust, I submit my will to reason, and content my self to beseech you to love me for ever, and to believe, that I shall be so faithful to you, that in case you should prove inconstant, I should never love any person after. Be confident, Madam (reply'd Aronces), you shall never have occasion to testifie that kind of fidelity: but if you do not promise me (added he) to be as fully assur'd of my constancy as I will be of yours, I think, I shall not be able to return; but without considering the particulars of my destiny, I will go find out Clelius. And withal (added he) I will undeceive him of the opinion he has of my wounding Octavius. It shall suffice (answer'd Clelia) that the Prince Artemidorus will take care to justifie you without your intermeddling in it your self. In the mean time (added she) I think it fit to confide in Herminius, whose probity can never be suspected by those to whom he is known. 'Tis my intention, (reply'd Aronces): but before I see him, permit me, Madam, to bid you adieu here apart, since my hard Fate will not suffer me to continue with you; for the sentiments of an amorous heart ought not to be divided.

Tell me then, Madam, that you will love me, that you will pity me, and that as soon as you can I shall be happy: and to assure you yet more of my fidelity, and take away all cause of doubting of it, know, that as often as you please, I will come, and give you an account of my actions, though I be put to enter Rome without a disguise; that as often as you please you shall make my arms fall out of my hands; and in a word, that you shall be always absolute Mistress of my destiny. But permit me also to hope that I shall have a share in all your thoughts, and that you can never be happy, till you have render'd me so. I promise you, (answer'd this fair person): but alas! (added she sighing) I fear we shall be alwayes miserable, at least, I know I am not able to foresee by what means we shall ever become otherwise. Tarquin may die, (reply'd Aronces), the interests of the King my Father may change, I may perhaps bend his mind, peace may be concluded, Clelius may cease to be unjust, and Horatius may be constrain'd to relinquish that which does not belong to him: therefore it is to be hop'd, that at length, by wayes which are unknown to us, Heaven will render us happy. 'Tis requisite indeed (said Clelia) to take up a hope to our selves, tho upon ill grounds, to avoid despair: but to speak sincerely, Fear is the Mistress in my heart. Yet I will hide part of it, (contin'd she) and content my self to conjure you to preserve your self for my sake. And now suffer me to call Valeria, Artemidorus, and Herminius, that you may depart; for tho the sight of you causes all the sweetness of my life, yet I shall have no quiet, till I know you are return'd into your prison, where at least your life is in safety. Alas! I beseech you, Madam, (answer'd Aronces) that I may speak onely three or four words more to you, Speak then, (reply'd she) but speedily; for when once one has but three or four words to speak, 'tis almost as good to be silent. Alas! Madam (cry'd he) you know not what Love is, if you account three or four words nothing, since 'tis true, one favourable word affords a thousand and a thousand pleasures to remember it. Therefore give me some to keep in my memory, and to comfort me during an absence whose continuance is uncertain. Tell me then too, discreet person as you are, whether you love me? Alas! (answer'd Clelia) can you doubt of what I think, and can it be necessary to tell you that which has been prov'd to you by a thousand testimonies of dearness? If it be not absolutely necessary, (reply'd he, looking upon her with much love) yet it is perfectly delightful: tell me then positively that you love me, and that you will love me eternally, to the end I may have something to supply me with comfort in my greatest misfortunes. I tell you all that can comfort you (answered Clelia): but after this ask no more of me, for I have nothing but tears to give you. Clelia had no sooner ended these words, but she made a sign to Valeria, that she should oblige Artemidorus and Herminius to approach towards them; and accordingly having fastned the door of this little Garden, they drew altogether. Then Aronces made a thousand caresses to Herminius; for as for Artemidorus he had seen him the evening before, having first discover'd and intrusted himself to him. Yet the discourse of these persons was not long, because Clelia was in such fear, lest Aronces should be discover'd, that she was not satisfi'd till he was withdrawn into the Gardener's house, where he had pass'd the preceding night. Nevertheless Aronces first told Artemidorus and Herminius the reasons which oblig'd him to serve the King his Father against Rome, he intreated them to disabuse Clelius of that opinion, that it was he that had wounded Octavius, he conjur'd them to serve him with their mediation to him, to speak alwayes in his favour to Clelia, and to pity him, for being of a side, on which his heart was not, and not to love him less for it. It is so ordinary (answer'd Herminius) to see brave persons engag'd to make war for unjust causes, that there is no intelligent person, but instead of blaming, will admire that which you do; and I am confident Clelius will esteem you more for continuing fixt to the interest of the King your Father, than if the love you bear to Clelia oblig'd you to come and side with Rome. For after you alone have caus'd us to gain the Battle, which put us in power to defend our selves, it is easie to know that if honour permitted you, you would do that again for Rome which you have done against its enemies. Be therefore assur'd, that for my part, I shall promote your interests vigorously, and that it shall be no fault of mine, if justice be not rendred to your Vertue. After this, these two illustrious Friends parted, but Artemidorus continu'd with Aronces, till the beginning of night, when he was to go away. Yet this generous Lover took his leave a second time of Clelia, with more dearness and tenderness than before. Herminius would willingly have staid with Aronces, as well as Artemidorus; but it was fear'd, that might cause it to be suspected, that there was some person hidden in the Garden; wherefore he went away with Clelia and Valeria; to rejoyne with Cesonia and Plotina, whom they beheld going out at the end of a walk; with an old man whom they did not know; who likewise took leave of them in that place, and went into the little Garden where Aronces and Artemidorus were. Well (said Herminius to Cesonia and Plotina) may I know your secret as well as I do that of Clelia and Valeria's. No question but you shall know it, (answer'd Plotina) for I have so great need of the generous Sevelia, that without her I should scarce know what to do with the secret which has been reveal'd to me. In the mean time (added she) since there is no person here in whom I may confide, I shall not scruple to say, that this secret is so important to me, that it has inform'd me I am not what I alwayes took my self to be; for I believ'd I was born at Ardea, and I was not; I thought I was the Daughter of a man, who was only Friend to my late Mother; and I am quite another Person than what I imagin'd. Clelia hearing Plotina speak thus, could not contain, notwithstanding the other imployment of her thoughts, from asking her who she was. Alas! my dear Clelia, (answer'd she) perhaps you will know but too soon; however, I would tell you at this instant, but having been made to promise not to speak of it yet, I must be contented to tell you, that I am that, which I should never have believ'd I could be; and I conjure you to promise me, that when you know who I am, you will not love me for it less. I assure you (reply'd Clelia) that the friendship I have for you being founded upon your merit, tho your birth should be less noble than I have believ'd it, I would not change the sentiment, I have for you. That which you say is very generous (said Cesonia) but 'tis not for that consideration Plotina fears you would love her less; for her birth is nobler than she believ'd, but however, I am confident she will not tell it you presently; for he that can unfold this riddle, is oblig'd to return this night to a prison whence he came forth, to expect till a great Princess deliver him from it; and after that he will come back to Rome, to inform you really who Plotina is. Nevertheless (added Cesonia, speaking to Clelia) continue to love her dearly; for tho she says, she fears you should love her less, yet I must assure you that, on the contrary, you will think your self oblig'd to love her more. After this these Ladies went into their Chariot, and Herminius return'd on horseback. On the other side, night was no sooner come, but Aronces, and that old man, who so long entertain'd Cesonia and Plotina, return'd to the prison from whence they came, for this man came along with Aronces to Rome. As for Clelia being she look'd upon all secrecy as criminal, she told Suspicia she had seen Aronces, and she told Octavius likewise, to the end to satisfy him that Aronces could not have been the Person that wounded him, and this prudent Lady so faithfully related to them all the generous sentiments of that illustrious Prince, that they admir'd his vertue, and became confirm'd in the resolution to serve him still with greater ardour. To which purpose they oblig'd Artemidorus to tell Clelius he had understood at Clusium, that when Aronces was arrested by Tarquinius, his sword was taken way from him, so to evince him that Octavius receiv'd not his wound from his hand; adding that he wondred the truth was not conjectur'd, it being a general order to disarm disarm all such as are put into prison: Whereby continued Artemidorus, it is easie for you to judge, that that sword you sometimes gave to Aronces, and which was drawn out of Octavius's body after the battle, was not in Aronces's hands when he was wounded by it: for when a prisoner escapes out of prison, it is not possible for him, to regain the sword which was taken from him. Besides that, I have been assur'd Tarquin gave that which was yours to one of his Officers. Tho' Aronces were innocent of the wounding Octavius (interrupted Clelius) it should not much advantage him in my favour; for since he is the Son of Porfenna, who is Tarquin's Protector, and consequently Rome's enemy, there needs no more to make me hate him. Yet you do not hate Telanus and Mamilius (answer'd Artemidorus) tho' they be Venitines; and the State of Venii a declared enemy to that of Rome. Mamilius and Telanus (reply'd Clelius) are two particular persons, who in their hearts do not approve the actions of those that govern their City. But Aronces is an illustrious unfortunate person (answer'd Artemidorus) who resents with much regret, Porfenna's undertaking the protection of Tarquin. Whether that be so or no (reply'd Clelius), all that I can answer is, that I consider nothing more than the interest of my Country, that there is nothing I do not think my self oblig'd to sacrifice for it, and that rather then be ingrateful to it, I had rather be so to Aronces. Tho' indeed having done as much for him, as he has for me, I do not look upon my self as liable to an accusation of ingratitude, tho' I should hate him as much as I have lov'd him. Artemidorus was desirous to press him further, but perceiving no effect of his mediation, but a further exasperation of his disgust, he broke off his discourse. Two daies after Publicola brought back the Army, for the reasons before mention'd; but tho' the pretence of his return was an intention to spare the blood of the people, to avoid giving battle again, and to cause the enemies Army to perish before their Walls, if they should dare to march against them, yet his return caus'd a great commotion amongst the people. For the solicitousness of Publicola and the second Consul, in fortifying all the out-places of Rome, in redoubling the City guard, and commanding all the Corn which was about in the Country, to be brought in thither, and all the moveables of private persons, who had houses in the Country, the people well understood, that they who were acquainted with the secrecy of affairs, certainly foresaw, that Rome would ere long be surrounded with a leagure. Whereupon every one taking order for his particular subsistence, it was not possible for this to be done without some trouble and confusion. All the Streets of this spacious City were seen cover'd with chariots, horses, and with terrifi'd and afflicted people. Some were driving flocks, others removing household-stuff, some were loaden with corn and fruits, whilst others not solicitous of their goods, only lead their Wives and children into a place of safety. There were some that gave out they had seen the forces appear, tho' it was not true; others lying after them, and encreasing their untruth, related stories of the disorders those forces had committed. They nam'd the Villages which they had burn'd, and told so many circumstances of violences committed by them, that they caus'd affrightment in all that heard them. The people thronging into the City, the Gates of it were not sufficient to receive all those conveniently, who endeavour'd to retire into it; so that there was a great tumult in the waies, gates, and streets; all the Tradesmen desisted from their works, and only beheld all these several passages with extreme sadness. There was also so great a disposition in them to murmur, that there was no person who did not complain. The poor said they only should suffer during the siege, and the rich were very forward to ingage in the war, because they knew well, that they should not undergo the inconveniences of it. They who inclin'd to Monarchy, said it was very incommodious to have so many Masters; Others, that all changes never brought any thing but mischief along with them; some others zealous for liberty quarrell'd with these, and maintain'd it was better to devour one another for hunger, and set fire to their City, than ever to yield to Tarquin. Some said it was not the best course to expect to be besieg'd, but rather to draw all the Romans out, and go and meet the enemy; others, that they would defend their wals, their wives, their children, their household-gods: but did not think fit to go and give battle: and the wiser and more understanding sort of people, endeavouring to reprove the multitude for their precipitious fear, fell into fury themselves, because they could not satisfy the people. Upon which Publicola having assembled the Senate, it was resolv'd, the only way to bring the people into their duty was to flatter them. To which purpose several Ordinances favourable to the Commonalty were constituted; for they were dispensed with from contributing to the charge of the war; a reasonable rate was set upon such things as were necessary for subsistence; the publick magazines were open'd; they were assur'd of all things necessary, as abundantly as the rich; it was given out by persons appointed to that purpose, that the enemies were not so strong, as was believ'd; shew was made of not fearing them; and the chief of the Senate made feasts out of policy, to intimate to the people, that they did not fear the wanting of any thing. So that as it is sometimes no less easie to appease a multitude than to move them, within two daies all the Tradesmen betook themselves to their callings as before; all the people that came out of the circum-jacent villages were dispos'd of in lodgings; and the false news changing the appearance of things, the same people who lately publisht other tidings so fatal and disadvantageous to Rome, now related a hundred contrary to Tarquin and Porfenna, which tho' they had no probability in them very often, yet there did not want some to believe them. In the mean time all these divers rumors hindred Clidamirus and Berelisa, from finishing their journey to Præneste, conceiving it better to remain still at Rome, tho' it were besieg'd, than to put themselves upon the way, at a time wherein there was yet no establish'd permission, and every one was taken for an enemy; besides that Artemidorus being at Rome, they had no great business any where else. As for Anacron he thought himself so well there, that he could not resolve to depart from thence so soon. Thomistus believing he could not pass the time of his exile more nobly than in beholding so important an action as this, which fortune presented to him, resolv'd to continue there to that end; Meregines and his other friend did the same; Artemidorus and Zenocrates were not solicitous to go away, for several reasons; and Amilcar was then so strongly engag'd to Rome,

Rome, that he did not think he should ever leave it. Amongst these illustrious persons was still enjoy'd part of the pleasures of peace, notwithstanding all the preparations for war. Yet the pretences for walking entertainments, were something relating to military affairs; for whereas formerly the Ladies were wont to make a walk to hear musick, they now went to behold the forces muster'd in the field of Mars, or see the pioneers making fortifications in several places of the City. Amidst all these disturbances, Love did not cease to exercise his dominion. Nevertheless, Spinus perceiv'd his affection did not so much proceed from the dearness he had for Valeria, as the hatred he bore to Herminius, Amilius, and Mutius, who understanding himself not so dextrous as his Rivals, in all those little diligences which Love inspires people with, whose genius is naturally sprightly, took up a thought to surpass them all in greatness of courage, and to exployt such extraordinary actions during the War, that Publicola should not dare to refuse Valeria to him, and his Rivals have no longer the boldness to pretend to her to his prejudice. As for Horatius, he had then more hope than ever before; Aronces was lost in Clelius's favour, himself was very powerful in Rome, his Rival was in the Party of the Enemies, and he pretended his services to the Republick should be so considerable, as that nothing could reasonably be refused at the end of the War. Octavius, as soon as he began to go abroad, went to visit Hermilia; and finding her still possess'd with a sadness which something corresponded with his present humour, he was pleas'd no where so much as in her company. At this time it was known, that the Prince of Messene, instead of going to Rome, as it was believ'd, went and sided with the enemies party, to be opposite to Themistius, who thereby found himself more engaged, to pass all the time of his exile at Rome, and serve that State during the War. As for Clelia, though the posture of her Fortune was very unhappy, yet she resented much consolation in having seen Aronces, and perceiv'd in his eyes, she had all the reason in the World to hope he would be constant, and that all the obstacles ill fortune should obstruct their happiness with, would not change his sentiment. Plotina, after what she had understood from that old man who came with Artemidorus, was affected with a secret joy, which would have been perfectly sweet, if it had not been allay'd with the impatience she had, because she could not discover it. But tho' this sometimes gave her occasion to muse, she was not much the more melancholy, but took all opportunities to delight her self. Amilcar being one day in her chamber, at the same time with Valeria, Berechisa, Clidamira, and Cesonia, there was occasion offer'd her to exercise her pleasant humour; for as it chanc'd Acrisius who talk'd too much, Sicinius who was too silent, and Damon who was of the Sect of Pythagorus, coming thither, Amilcar, and she, diverted themselves much to the disadvantage of these three Rivals, and especially of the last. While this company was speaking of several indifferent things, Anacreon and Herminius enter'd and said, they had newly learn'd some tidings which much affected them with compassion. Valeria demanded what they imported? whereupon, Herminius addressing to her, I understand (said he) the unfortunate Calianthus, who, as you know, desir'd permission to build a Tomb for his two Rivals, who were slain in the last Battle, is himself slain by a party of the enemies, in defending the Tomb which he caus'd to be built. So that of four Lovers, who contended together, there is none living but Melicerates. Since none could be happy but he, (answer'd Acrisius) it is as good that they are dead; for what is life good for, when that cannot be enjoy'd which only is capable to render it delightful? Acrisius would have proceeded farther, if Plotina had suffered him to speak, but the better to silence him, she began to lament Calianthus, with much exaggeration; the other Ladies pitied him likewise, and Anacreon himself, as great a friend of joy as he was, testified his commiseration of his Fate. For my part (said Damon then, who alwayes spoke according to the sentiments of Pythagorus) my soul is not so sensible of compassion towards those who dye, as those who suffer any pain; for according to my apprehensions, such as dye, only change their Country and condition, but do not cease to be, so that the continual change which all souls undergo, makes their sorrow unjust who afflict themselves so much for the death of those we know, if they be not absolutely necessary to our felicity. For my part, (said Plotina) I know not how you understand it; but if I were of your opinion, I should not be much comforted in dying, tho' I should know my Soul were to pass into the body of the most jolly Turtle in the World; and besides, were what you say true, people would have some remembrance of things they had known before. But I am well assur'd I remember nothing; and I believe too with sufficient certainty, that when I shall be dead, I shall no longer remember any thing which I speak at present. Your education (answer'd Damon) having been amongst such persons who were not instructed by the learned in the Doctrine of Pythagorus, it is no great wonder if you do not comprehend what I say. However, 'tis certain, there is nothing more consentaneous to reason than the opinion of that Philosopher in this point. For whereas the gods, who are Masters of the World, change nothing in their workmanship, but we see alwaies the same Seas, the same Rivers, the same Mountains, that they have fram'd a certain number of Stars, which neither increases nor diminishes; it is easie to imagine that they have also created a certain number of Souls, which continually pass from one body to another, according to their pleasure. So that many times we bewail people, who are in a condition more happy than that which they have forsaken. But what serves this present happiness for, (said Plotina) since I remember a past felicity no longer, and I have reason to say, The things we remember no longer, are no longer ours. But, Madam, (replyed he, shaking his head a little) it is not be imagin'd, there is none in the World remembers what has been formerly; for I have heard several Disciples of Pythagorus affirm, there are some, who remember the actions of a precedent life perfectly. But do you remember (said Acrisius) what you have been? I am not so as vain to profess it, (answer'd Damon gravely;) for this seldome happens, but to persons who are of so exquisite a temper, as that all the faculties of their Souls are in their utmost perfection, by reason that the Bodies which they animate, are so well dispos'd, that nothing impedes or disturbs their imagination, memory, or judgement. I must then ask all that are present (said Plotina) if they remember any thing. For my part (said Cesonia) I am very unlikely to remember what I was before my being what I am; for I scarce remember what I did yesterday. And I (said Anacreon) am so taken up with the present, that I cannot reflect upon what is past. To speak my thoughts (said Valeria), the future takes up my mind more than any thing else, so that 'tis no wonder if I remember nothing. I remember many past things (said Berelisa), but they are only such as I have seen with my own eyes. I am much like you in that (answered Clidamira); for I know many things which I shall not forget during my life, but they are not of the nature of those Damon speaks of. I confess (said Sicinius, then smiling) I so little love to speak of that which befalls me, that tho I should remember what I have been, before I became what I am, I think I should not declare it. For my part (said Acrisus) if I remembered any thing I should willingly tell it. I know not (said Herminius) whether it be the fault of my constitution, or of this Doctrine, but I remember nothing at all. Whilst the Company was discoursing thus, Amilcar appear'd pensive and musing, and spoke not at all; upon which Plotina, not doubting but he was contriving some subtilty, asked him, whether he would not declare if he remember'd what he had been before his last coming into the World. Amilcar, then returning from his feigned musing, answered ambiguously, and forc'd Plotina to command him to speak what he really thought. Sincerely (said he to her) you are a cruel person, to constrain me to be of the same opinion with one of my Rivals. How? (interrupted Plotina hastily, making shew of being astonish'd) is it possible an African should be of the Sect of Pythagoras? 'Tis to no purpose to deny it, (answer'd he, with a tone something serious): I am not only charm'd with his Doctrine; but convinc'd of it too by my own experience; and if I were at Metopontium or at Crotona, I should speak more freely of these matters than at Rome, where this opinion is not follow'd, though it be not generally condemn'd. At least, I know the memory of Pythagoras is in veneration here, and it is not unknown, that he was the wisest Philosopher that ever wore that name, the most gentle and humane. For, to give the more weight to this discourse, (added he) it is sufficiently apparent, that he was truly perswaded of the transmigration of Souls out of some bodies into others; since this, no doubt, was the cause of forbidding the use of any sort of living Creatures for food. You have made a great secret of your opinion (reply'd Plotina, who understood he derided Damon) but to punish you for your dissimulation, tell us, in brief, whether you, who have so handsome a wit, so quick a fancy, so faithful a memory, and a constitution so perfect, have yet any remembrance of what you were, before you came to be Amilcar. 'Tis certain (said Damon then) that truth constrains me to say, I never knew any man so fit as he, to remember what he was before his last birth: for he is of that happy temper wherein the Soul is so dis-intangled from the cumberfomeness of the Senses, that she may seem to be able to unloosen her self from them, and act without them, whensoever she pleases. I beseech you my dear Rival, (answer'd Amilcar with seeming anger) let us not mock one another in so good Company, by publishing things which they will not believe. I engage my self to make you be believ'd by above half those that are present, (said Plotina pleasantly): therefore tell us whether you remember you were any thing, before you were the same Person which I see you. In the name of the gods (said Damon then speaking to Amilcar) if it has pleas'd destiny to make your birth so happy, as that you are one of the number of those, who have the preheminance to know what they have formerly been, speak it confidently, in the averment of a truth of highest importance, which perhaps you may convince some persons of, who may afterwards propagate it to all the most illustrious in Rome. Herminius observing, Damon's zeal for Pythagoras's Doctrine, made him liable to be abus'd, for the diversification of the Company entreated Amilcar to declare, as the rest, all that his memory inform'd him of. Valeria did the like; Berelisa, Clidamira, and Cesonia added their requests; Acrisus importun'd him to it; Anacreon desir'd him to do it, and Sicinius made a consenting sign to him, to signify that his desires were the same with those of all the Company; after which Plotina commanding him to speak, he did so in this manner: I am going to obey you, Madam, (said he to her) but I beseech your favour, not to reveal that which I shall tell you, and withal oblige those who are present to keep fidelity to me; for 'tis no great pleasure to be shewn in the Streets for a man, to whom extraordinary things has happened. Amilcar seem'd so serious in these words, that Plotina was almost ready to believe that he spoke in earnest. But at length all the Company having promis'd not to promulgate what he should tell them, he studi'd for some time and, seeming wholly recollected in him self, spoke in these words, addressing his words to Plotina. When you shall have heard what I have to tell you, (said he) you will less wonder at the boldness I have in loving you; for I have not alwaies been a Wit. 'Tis true my Soul has experimented a great variety of different Fortunes, and this very Spirit, which animates me, has pass'd through several bodies of no mutual resemblance. Moreover (added he, with a grave and imperious aspect) it must not be imagin'd that I speak without knowing what induces me to it; for tho I may seem a person fitter to compose a jovial Sonnet, than to understand the whole doctrine of Pythagoras to the bottom, yet if I embrac'd it, I would clearly give you to understand the most obscure matters, and so unfold to you the necessity that there be eternally a prefixt number of Souls in the whole Universe, animating all the Bodies in it, that afterwards there would be no place left to doubt of all the doctrine of Pythagoras. For it being constantly true, (contin'd he, after having made all the appearances of one that has a good opinion of that which he speaks, and who nevertheless studies a little what he desires to express) that the principles of things consist in numbers, that proportion and Symetry are found every where, and that the harmony which results from this exactness, is, that which maintains the World; it is easie to understand, that the number of Souls is not unequal. The order of the Universe is alwaies equal; there is neither more nor less matter in one age than in another; a Tree puts forth leaves in the Spring, those leaves fall at Autumn, and the Tree renders back to the Earth all it received from it; and if it be burnt, the ashes return to the same place with the leaves. People delight to make Water-

ter-courses to divide Rivers, and cause Fountains to spurt forth; yet there is not one drop of water less in all the Universe, in which is made a continual transmutation of all bodies. Since therefore matter is always equal, why should any imagine Souls not to be so too? The Stars are always in the same number, as Damon hath well observ'd; we see but one Moon and one Sun; and, were it not incongruous to make shew of learning before Ladies, I should swear to you by the number of Four, which is the greatest oath of Pythagoras's Disciples, you would soon believe all that I do. For my part (said Plotina) I am already almost wholly dispos'd to believe you; but being I always love Examples more than Reasons, and the principles of things and numbers are otherwise beyond my understanding, I intreat you to imagine I believe there is a certain number of Souls which pass successfully into the Bodies of Men and Beasts; for I am ready to die with desire, to know what beast or Heroe you have been. Ah! Madam, (cry'd Damon, who heartily wish't Amilcar had convinc'd her of his opinion) persons that believe so easily, do as good as not believe at all. Sincerely (answer'd she) I am the most dispos'd to hear Amilcar, that possible can be. Permit me then to speak (reply'd he); for it is not more true that the number of Ten is the most perfect of all numbers, according to the doctrine of Pythagoras, than it is true that I die with desire to tell you all I remember I have been. Speak then (said Plotina) and do not fear being interrupted, unless it be to ask you some particularities, which I shall be desirous to know. Know then (answer'd he, with a very serious tone) that the most ancient thing I can call to remembrance, is my having been a great Priest in Aegypt, a long time before the first of the Pyramids which are seen there, was built. But this I remember so confusedly, that there remains nothing of it in my mind, but the knowledge of Hieroglyphicks, which, no doubt, I understand still sufficiently well, therefore I shall not detain you in speaking of it, having other things of more curiosity and divertisement to tell you. After I dy'd in a Temple, my soul pass'd into the body of a young Prince, of a handsome, comely, and agreeable personage. But the strangest thing is, (continu'd he very seriously) that I cannot remember, what ever endeavour I make, in what Country I liv'd; I only know, that I liv'd in a Court of great splendor, that I had an amorous inclination, that I lov'd all pleasures of Converse, and could not endure solitude for so much as a quarter of an hour. I had also so great an inclination to all kind of Society, that I remember I promis'd above half a score of young Virgins to marry them, and I know not whether or no I did not marry two or three of them. Moreover I remember very well I loved flattery, and yet was not over-liberal in rewarding flatterers; that I easily enough forgot services that were done me, that I believ'd with an equal facility all the good that was spoken of me, and all the evil, that was told me of others, and was no very commendable friend. As for War I know not whether I lov'd it or no, but I know I di'd at no great age, and that never having had leisure to think of death, nor made any reflection upon it to compose my mind resolutely against it, I found myself much perplex'd when I saw it at hand; and to say truth, entertain'd it after a very unkind manner. But afterwards I was strangely astonish't, after having been in so good company, to find myself a Phoenix in Arabia, and the only one of my kind; for without doubt, you know, Madam, there is but one Phoenix in the World. Amilcar spoke this so seriously, that none of the company had the confidence to dare to laugh; and they constrain'd themselves the more willingly, to further the mockery of Damon. How (said Plotina then to him) were you a Phoenix? Yes, Madam, (answer'd he) and if I were a considerable wit, I would maintain that I am one again at present; and that after having been a Phoenix in Arabia, I am again the Phoenix of Lovers in Rome; but because I am in a serious discourse this day, I content myself to assure you that I was really a Phoenix, and that never any thing troubled me more. I was indeed very comely, and, when I beheld myself sometimes in a River, I took sufficient pleasure in the handsomeness of my shape; but being I was destitute of love, and could not be otherwise, my beauty was sufficiently unprofitable to me. If I should desire your picture (said Plotina) now you are Amilcar, I think it would not be seemly; but I conceive there is no great danger in intreating you to give me your pourtraiture as a Phoenix. Since you command me (answer'd Amilcar) I will tell you that the Phoenix is as big as an Eagle, that the Feathers of his body and wings are half carnation, and half of the colour of gold; that his tail is of the most excellent blew that ever was seen, and his neck like a Rainbow, that he has a thick and large tuft upon his head of lively and well mingled colours, peircing eies, and feet resembling sprays of Coral. This is, Madam, the shape of a Phoenix, and such was I at that time: however I was extremely melancholy, tho I thought myself very handsome, and was in a delightful country; for there is a certain place in Arabia the Happy, where all Trees, Flowers and Herbs, have an odoriferous smell, where Incense is found in abundance, and where I perch'd myself when I pleas'd upon the Cinamon Trees. Thus a thousand agreeable odours perfuming the air, and a thousand handsome objects offering themselves to my eies from all parts, it may be thought I could not be otherwise than happy. But to speak truth, it being always impossible to be so without love, I was sufficiently miserable. For every year in the Spring, I with envy beheld Nightingales singing and making love. It was in vain for me to seek for any company; I found myself always alone; other birds went together sometimes by troops, whilst I remain'd alone with my beauty in an forc'd solitude, which was insupportable to me. But were you not happy (said Plotina) in not being subject either to love or jealousy, in being free from the trouble of building a nest like other birds, in being always the goodliest bird in the World, and consequently not envious of others? Alas! Madam, (answer'd he) I accounted it better to be envious than discontented, as the Phoenix is. Wherefore ever since (added he) I have always had very great compassion of those fair women, whom jealous husbands leave in deserts in the Country, where they see nothing they can love, and where solitude is not voluntary to them; for there is nothing so ungrateful, as to be constrain'd to be alone, when one desires to be in company. And I can assure you, that when I had liv'd 160 years, which is the ordinary life of a Phoenix, I was infinitely joyful that I was oblig'd to build my funeral pile, which I did with all possible expedition, with Incense, cinnamon, and other aromatical woods, in the season the Sun is hottest. After which, putting myself upon it after a faint manner, I fell asleep through tediousness of my long solitude. During my sleep, I expir'd with weakness, the Sun fir'd the pile which I had made, and reduced me into ashes, to leave something, out of which my successor might arise. Moreover, I remember very distinctly, that my last thoughts, while a Phoenix, were extremely melancholy, for having spent so long a life without loving any thing; for when I call'd to mind, that I had a hundred and sixty Springs, seen all the birds of my lovely desert making love to one another, I was infinitely discontented; and therefore (contin'd he) if there be any in the company, who, to their unhappiness, have made a resolution not to love any thing, let them hasten to change it; for there is nothing more tormenting at the hour of death than the affliction of having not been able to love or be lov'd. I assure you (said Valeria) I believe it is very troublesome too, to call to mind an unsuccessful or impertinent love. However it be (said Damon, who was unwilling Amilcar should be interrupted) suffer the relation to be finish'd, which has been so delightfully begun; for though Amilcar alwaies mingles some raillery in what he speaks, yet credit ought to be given to his words, since all the company knowes 'tis his custome never to speak altogether seriously of the most serious things. You have reason (answer'd Plotina) therefore I desire Amilcar to continue his relation. After I had ceas'd being a Phoenix (said Amilcar) I chang'd my fortune and shape very much; for I became one of the most ugly men in the World, but in requital one of the most valiant; for I lov'd nothing so much as war, which I follow'd continually; not but that my heart was in some sort sensible of love, though it was a kind of souldier-like Love, which does not cause much sighing, but has something of freedom and jollity in it, but seldom any great matter of courtship; and therefore I took more pleasure in relating a handsome field wherein I had fought, a siege I had been present at, or a particular combate of my own, than in entertaining myself with the favours of my mistress. But perhaps (interrupted Plotina smiling) it was because you had not any great matter to say upon that subject; at least I know if any lov'd me after the military manner you have represented to me, it should be easie to reckon the favours I would do him. All women (answer'd Herminius) are not of your humor; for, some fancy those resolute gallants with fierce countenances, who speak with boldness, and have kill'd men, more than polite and civiler persons, who comport themselves with respect and tenderness. No doubt, Herminius has reason (reply'd Amilcar) for I was not very ill treated, and my stoutness caus'd me to obtain as many favours, as my wit and courtship. 'Tis true, I did not care over much for them; and I remember one thing which makes good what I say: One day I lost a picture which I had of my mistress, as I was fighting with a man, who had set upon me at an advantage, and I was much more joyful for having taken his sword from him, than troubled for having lost the picture. Indeed when a fancy takes a man to pass for one of greater courage than others, I assure you he is sufficiently employ'd; for he is possess'd with envy, jealousy, and ambition all at a time; danger is fought with eagerness (though to speak sincerely, 'tis never delightful;) he alwaies desires to go beyond the rest, and is altogether incapable of quiet. Then, 'tis sufficiently troublesome to be sometimes wounded, and sometimes a prisoner; for the Kings and Princes, for whose service you hazard or lose your lives, take little care of you. However, since 'tis the mode, it ought to be follow'd and I follow'd it so well, that I was but twenty nine years old when I was slain. 'Tis true, I had serv'd in fourteen companies with sufficient honour to be content with life, were it not that it is alwaies sufficiently difficult to resolve to die. But afterwards (added he, not giving leisure to any to interrupt him) my adventure was strange enough; for after having shewn much bravery, the gods to punish me for being guilty of too much vanity in that respect, were pleas'd the same soul which in another body had been so stout and hardy, should animate that of one of the most pusillanimous men in the world. At first I was not very sorry for it; for I confess to you, I was a little weary with the tumultuous life which I had led, and those former impressions not being yet wholly blotted out, I imagined that choosing a kind of calm life I might spend my daies with sufficient sweetness. But, alas! I was deceiv'd; for as soon as it was perceiv'd I was one of no courage, I was expos'd to a hundred thousand troublesome occasions, and I assure you the people of the world who suffer most, are they who have the unhappiness to be cowards. For I dare maintain, it is a thousand times more pain to be void of valour, than to be too courageous; for a man who is valiant resolves upon death without fear at the beginning of the fight; whereas a poor wretch who is not, fears it in places where it is not to be met with. For my part, whilst I was a coward, I fear'd both my friends and my enemies; when I was forced to go to the war, and shame engaged me to be present in any encounter, the torment I suffer'd was above imagination. Example did not animate me, the noise of arrowes clashing together made my heart quake; I was alwaies prepar'd for a retreat, and alwaies observ'd to be last at the battle, and the foremost in the flight. I went whither I was unwilling to go, I did not go where I desir'd to be; I was possess'd with fear and shame: and amidst all this, with a sortish pride, which caused me to do things of which I repented a moment after. But that which afflicted me most, was, that though at my return from the war, I spoke as if I had been courageous, yet I knew it was understood well enough that I was not. Therefore I say once again, there is nothing more painful than to want courage; and a brave person that engages in a hundred thousand dangers, suffers much less than a man who continually fear things which are not to be fear'd. Now therefore (said Damon) can what Amilcar saies be doubted of? for could he invent an adventure of this nature, were it not truth that forces him to speak? Damon pronounc'd these words after a manner which surpriz'd all the company; indeed he was a person not absolutely without wit; but when a man is once capable to give himself up to believe a difficult & extraordinary thing, he maintains it more obstinately than if it were easie to be believ'd, and is so prepossess'd with it, that he is easily perswaded of any thing that may serve to authorize it. Thus the poor Damon, not perceiving that his Rival made sport with him, conjur'd him that he would proceed. Cesario nia and Valeria did the same; Anacreon, Herminius, Acristus, and Sicinius, press'd him to it; so that refusing his discourse, I assure you, (said he) that Life, which they say is a thing very precious, is notwithstanding more painful then 'tis thought to be. For tho I remember every thing that I have been, yet I do not remember I was ever perfectly happy. Nevertheless, I was not altogether miserable after having been so fearful; for I was destin'd to become a Swan; I had also the good hap to be in one of the goodliest Lakes that ever I beheld, and to feed very frequently from the fairest hands in the world; for the place I was in, belong'd to a very beautiful person who lov'd me extremely. But at length it behov'd me to sing in order to my death; on which occasion, I found, that, tho they say the singing of Swans is very agreeable, it is so troublesome to the singers, that I was extremely willing to change my shape. I repented me soon after that wish; for, the gods, to punish me for being dissatisfied with my condition, when I was one of the fairest Swans that ever was in the world, made me a bad Poet. This was a state of great misery to me; not but that I accounted all that I compos'd, very good, and admir'd my self for it; but alwaies some adventure hapned, which made me know I was my own sole admirer. I bethought my self one day unhappily, to go shew some Verses I had made in a great Company, without declaring my self to be the Author, hoping thereby to be commended the more. But I repented my self of it extremely; for there was no person but judg'd them bad, and made a mockery of them. But that which afflicted me yet more, was, that I defended them in such a manner, as gave those who derided them, to understand that I made them; upon which, beginning to moderate what they had said, they wholly cast me into despair. Not but that I believ'd they judg'd badly of my Verses; but this did not hinder me from being possess'd with infinite indignation. I lookt upon the Age I liv'd in as ignorant, that people did not judge but according to their capricious humour or favour, that I deserv'd better than they who were commended above me; and at length I dy'd in the error I had liv'd in, that is, I alwaies believ'd my Verses were good, tho I remember well at this day, they were extream bad. But for that I had alwaies devour'd my self, the decree of fate was, that I should become a Pelican, which notwithstanding, is a Bird sufficiently rare, and of which kind, there are not many more than of that of the Phoenix: but at last dying to give life to my little Pelicans, which were very sprightly, my Soul was sent to Sparta, to animate the body of a young Lacedemonian, who was the most dexterous Thief that ever liv'd. There I rob'd so cunningly, that one day a young and fair person, confest to me, I had stolne her heart above six moneths before she perceiv'd it. How? Amilcar, (cry'd Plotina, who only took an occasion to laugh) you put me in great fear, and I should be circumvented, if you should have taken my heart without my knowing any thing of it. As for that point, (answer'd Damon coldly) 'tis apparent, Amilcar is pleas'd to add an agreeable Fiction to Truth, tho he would do better to speak a little more seriously of a matter of such importance I will do what you desire, (reply'd Amilcar; without being mov'd) and tell you that after this, I became a jealous Husband; then, a jealous Mistress; shortly after, a jealous Lover, a jealous Wife, a jealous Friend, jealous without cause and reason; and, in brief, experienc'd jealousy in so many manners, that I may say, I was, for several Ages extremely miserable. But that which is remarkable, (continu'd Amilcar) is, that I never was an old man; and therefore I am desirous, out of curiosity only to become so once. I believe it; (answer'd Plotina smiling) but not to let slip the occasion of contenting my curiosity, since you have made tryal of jealousy of all sorts that can be, tell us a little, whether a jealous Wife be tormented more than a jealous Husband? No doubt she is; (answer'd Amilcar) for the passions of Women when they love being more violent, it is easie to judge, that their jealousy is more tormenting to them than that of Men; besides, having not so much liberty to act in order to clearing their suspicions, nor so much power to be reveng'd, they must needs suffer far more. For my part, (said Anacreon) I would ask of you whether the jealousy of a Husband be more troublesome than that of a Lover? That of a Husband (answer'd Anacreon) is more troublesome for the Wife, than that of a Lover is for his Mistress; but as for him that suffers, I assure you, that according to the experience I have made of it, it is more incommodious to be a jealous Husband, than to be a jealous Lover. For my part, (said Herminius) I conceive, that instead of inquiring of Amilcar, those different degrees of jealousy, it were better he told us what jealousy is; for after having try'd it so much, methinks he should better understand it than we do. Herminius has reason, (said Damon) for by so many several effects, as Amilcar has seen of jealousy, he may have discover'd it's true cause and nature. I assure you, (answer'd he) jealousy is a thing harder to be known than is believ'd; and when I consider all my several jealousies, I find my self sufficiently perplex'd, to tell you what I conceive of that passion. Yet 'tis certainly a very powerful one, and more powerful than Love; since it sometimes extinguishes it. But that which is constantly true, is, that as a stone does more or lesse mischief proportionably to the strength or weaknesse of the arme that flings it; so jealousy is greater or lesse, according to the measure of Love, from whence it arises. But yet I desire to know, (said Anacreon) whether jealousy arises from the greatnesse of Love, or from the distrust one has of himself, or of the person lov'd? Why one cannot love vehemently without being a little jealous? and why it is necessary that the greatest punishment of life, should be inseparably conjoyn'd with the greatest pleasure in the World? The reason is, (answer'd Amilcar) because Love is nothing but a desire, desires are scarce ever without fear, and fear in Love not without jealousy. For as of necessity Love must precede jealousy, so of necessity likewise jealousy, must be preceded by fear. For, were it not fear'd a woman might prove unfaithful, no person would ever be jealous; if it were not fear'd a Rival might be lov'd, none would be possess'd with jealousy; so that it may be said, if there were no fear, there would be no jealousy; if nothing were fear'd, there would be no desires; and if no desires, no Love. But because people desire, therefore they love; because they love, they fear; and because they fear, they are jealous: So that to determine the original of jealousy, it must be held to be the daughter of desire and fear, and because one cannot love without desire and fear, it is almost an impossibility to love long without jealousy. Your discourse is extremely rational, (answer'd Damon), but yet it would be better to proceed, to inform us what you have been in latter times. Of a jealous Husband, (said Amilcar) I became a Tyger in Lybia, a Shepherd in Arcadia, a Carver at Corinth, a Peacock in Sicily, a Painter at Athens, a Musician in Lydia, and an Owle at Prænestæ. But for that the relation of my adventures while an Owle, would not afford you much Pleasure, I shall content my selfe, to tell you only what I was before I was Amilcar. I beseech you tell us that presently, (said Plotina). I was Servius Tullus, (answer'd he, with a strange confidence). How? (said Plotina, with a fain'd astonishment) were you a King of Rome? Yes (answer'd he) and therefore it was I told you, in the beginning of my discourse, you would no longer wonder at my boldnesse in loving you, after you knew all that I have been; and this is the reason also that I hate Tarquin so much, and have lign'd my selfe to the service of Rome. For they who have any remembrance left of their severall changes, have also some inclinations, in their present condition, correspondent to what they have been; and therefore you ought not wonder that I love Rome, altho I am an African. No, (reply'd Plotina maliciously); for Rome is sufficiently lovely of her selfe, to attract your affection: but I wonder very much at your so exact remembrance of so many things, and at my own remembring nothing at all. For, as for my part; I declare to you, I do not remember I was ever any other than Plotina. But perhaps (answer'd Amilcar smiling) it is, because you have not consider'd on it; for certainly it is not without the strength of deep reflection, that I have been able to recount to you all I have done. Amilcar spoke this with a certain air, beholding Plotina, which suddenly ligni'd to Damon, that this Rival had made pastime of his opinions, and fain'd these stories to divert the Companie. For my part, (said Acrisius then, who sought occasion onely to speak) I will endeavour to recite all the changes Amilcar remembers of himselfe. Do not give your selfe the trouble, (answer'd Damon rising up) for I am assur'd that tho it be true that Amilcar remembers what he has been, when I am gone, he will say, his intention was only to make pastime, and divert you with pleasant mockerie; but whatever he sayes, it is certain, the opinion of Pythagoras is that alone, which can be follow'd with reason. Damon spake this with something a sharp tone of his voice, which ligni'd, that he at length perceiv'd Amilcar only to deride his belief. Plotina therefore was offering to say something to to pacify him, but he went away, and would not continue longer. 'Tis true, he afforded great pleasure to the Company, and especially to Plotina, who had an extream desire to laugh in liberty at Amilcar's confidence, in relating all those odd changes. For my part, (said she) I cannot understand how a man otherwise indu'd with reason, can be capable to believe things so extravagant. I am not of your mind, (said Anacreon) for I never wonder'd at any thing, and lesse at these kind of things than others; because there is never any prepossession of mind so strong, as that which has some appearance of Religion and Piety. For the morality of Pythagoras, having pleas'd Damon, because it was full of humanity and sweetnesse, he afterwards submitted his mind, to believe all that has been taught by a Man, whose Virtue charm'd him. For as we more easily believe what our Friends tell us, than what we learn from our Enemies, or people who are indifferent to us; so it often times falls out in the reading of Books. Men take an affection to the opinions of some persons, in certain matters; and when their affection is so settled, they are afterwards capable to believe all that he saies, upon his word, and in the mean time, thinks they are perswaded to do so by their own reason. But in briefe (interrupted Plotina) should the best of my Friends tell me, 'Tis further from the top of the Capitol to the bank of Tyber, than from the bank of Tyber to the top of the Capitol, I should not believe him; because my reason would inform me otherwise. As often as any one goes about to tell things contrary to a truth known to all the World: (reply'd Anacreon), you will not be perswaded to believe them; but when a person for whom you have a very great esteem, endeavours to perswade you to follow his opinion blindly, no question, it must be some thing of that kind, which no person can ever know perfectly, unlesse the gods reveal it to him, and which cannot be judg'd of but by conjectures; the testimonies are so frequently dubious, that they sometimes occasion great errors in the world. Which being so, it is not to be wonder'd, if a person who by his own reason cannot penetrate into the truth, gives credit to a man whom he otherwise infinitely esteems, and believes him to have discover'd what he is unable to do, blindly embracing his sentiments upon a false conceit of being induc'd to do so by a thousand reasons. Therefore they are to be excus'd, who are not of our sentiments; for the belief we have of things supernatural, does not depend absolutely of our selves. If I were an Æthiopian, I should not believe that which I now do; if Amilcar were a Roman, he would have other sentiments; if Herminius were a Greek, he would have opinions which now he has not, altho the Greeks and Romans agree in several matters. Wherefore, I think, I have reason to say, 'tis injustice to accuse those of folly, who endeavour to defend the opinions of their Forefathers, and their Country; and that their unhappinesse is justly to be pity'd, in being educated with a prejudic'd reason, which hinders them from discerning the truth; and it is charity to pray the gods to enlighten them. Let us therefore pity the poor Damon, (answer'd Plotina) for he is really worthy of pity for believing Amilcar was a Phoenix. After this, the Subject of the conversation being chang'd, they discours'd of a thousand delightfull matters, till Artemidorus coming thither, inform'd the Company, intelligence was brought that the Siege of Rome was resolv'd upon by Porfenna and Tarquin, and that in a few dayes they must look to see the enemy's Army about the walls. This news chang'd the discourse and oblig'd this noble company to retire. Three dayes after, there was a magnificent Ceremony in Rome; for, the Chief Vestal being dead suddenly, she that was to succeed her, and to whom she had voluntarily a little time before resign'd all authority, was put in possession of it, by the Chief of that Order, in presence of the Senate, and all the people. The deceased Vestal being Sister to Clelins. Clidamira and Berelisa, thought fit to go and comfort Sulspitia and Clelia; but Valeria withheld them, telling them, that when a Vestal dies, after having satish'd all the engagements engagements she was oblig'd to, it would be an injury in her Relations, to be afflicted for her death, there being nothing so glorious, as to have pass'd her life in keeping the sacred Fire, without having ever committed the least fault. And moreover (added Valeria) those two persons are at present sufficiently employ'd in conjecturing what the great Vestal intended to say at her death; for finding her self not well, she gave charge to one to desire Clelius to take care of Plotina, and to tell him she was the Daughter—— She would have said something more, but Death intercepted her speech: so that none can devise what to think of this adventure. In the mean time, great rejoycing was made at Rome by the People, when they understood, she that was going to be chief of the Vestals, was worthy of the honour she was to possess. Since we are Strangers here (answer'd Berelisa) I shall be glad you would please to make me know that person before I see the ceremony, which is to be solemniz'd this day, for according to the sentiments I have at present, if it were permitted to become a Vestal at the age I am of, and a Stranger might be one, I should gladly embrace that retirement. But since it is not I must be contented to be one of the friends of the Chief Vestal. And indeed Berelisa, whose jealousy daily encreas'd, being weary of residing all her life with Clidamira, had a desire to obtain the friendship of the grand Vestal, to the end that she might make use of her power in Rome, in case she should stand in need of it: wherefore pressing Valeria to describe her to her, and Clidamira not opposing her curiosity, Valeria satisfied her in the following words.

The prudent Octavia (for so is the Chief Vestal call'd) is so worthy of the rank she is going to possess, that since the first Original of that Order, there never was any whose birth was more illustrious, and vertue more glorious. For she is of a descent so noble, that none is more, whether you consider her Fathers Family or that of her Mother, whose beauty was so admirable, that they who have seen, affirm the splendor of Lucretia's was inferior to hers. She had also this extraordinary advantage, that time had respect to her beauty; for tho she was not young when she di'd, yet she then went beyond all other fair ones. She had likewise the glory, not onely to die with all her charms, but also to behold Death with so great Constancy, that she seem'd to triumph over it, tho she was constrain'd to yield to it; such admirable courage did she testify in that fatal encounter. But to return to the virtuous Octavia. You must know she was shut up in the Cloyster of the Vestals, when she was but seven years old, and being of a race to which beauty seems necessarily appendant, she was then the fairest Child in the World, and is yet at this day so fair, so lovely, and of so good and charming an aspect, that it is easie to conceive the truth of what I say. Octavia is tall, has much modesty in her countenance, and goodness in her looks, a thousand charms in her mouth, spirit and sweetness in her eyes, and sometimes cheerfulness too, tho she has the most prudent aspect in the World, and is really one of the wisest persons upon the face of the Earth. Octavia has a clear complexion, a round visage; little dimples in her cheeks and chin, blew eyes admirably handsome; and a certain air of freedom, goodness, and modesty, which is perfectly pleasing. Yet that modesty of hers has something of greatness in it and does not detract from a certain noble aspect, which is peculiar to those of her Family. She has a young Sister, who has been brought up with her, and tenderly loves her, who is one of the fairest persons in the World; whose beauty has all that can aspire respect; for she is tall and of a handsome shape, her hair is of a light ash-colour, her complexion is the fairest that ever was beheld, she blushes after the most charming manner that ever any person did, she has extream lovely eyes, of a kind of blew, which renders them so sweet, that never was there more agreeable looks than hers. Yet the casts of her eyes are negligent, but so full of Love, that they inspire it to all such as are capable of it. Another wonder of the fair Cerintia is, that her whole Countenance is so graceful, her mouth so handsomely shap'd, her lips of so pure a carnation, and her smiles so charming, that nothing can possibly be fanci'd of greater perfection. Moreover her neck is so comely, that 'tis hard to know to what part to give the preheminance; but with so many perfections, which might excite her to pride, Cerintia is modest; she makes no account of her beauty, she passionately loves glory, and begins to see the World with as much prudence, as if she had had the leisure to know it. It may be said, her vertue surpasses her beauty, and that she will get as much esteem by her wisdom, as she will excite love by the charms she is Mistress of. But to return to Octavia, tho she has been shut up amongst the Vestal Virgins in her tenderest infancy, and be now of an age, in which it cannot be said she has had leisure to have much experience, yet she has a wit of excellent capacity, a Soul confirm'd in vertue by a thousand reflections upon the condition she has chosen, which she admirably acquits herself of. For tho Octavia be naturally sufficiently debonaire, yet she has been alwaies one of the most exact persons in the World to do her duty; and since the first being of Vestals, there never was any so careful and so punctual in observing all things which her profession requires. Whilst she was in the age of obedience, she obeyed with submission; when she came to command, she commanded with an authority that makes her be fear'd, and nevertheless makes her be lov'd too, even by those that fear her. She vigorously maintains the privileges of the Vestals, and gently remits her severity in favour of her Companions upon several small inconsiderable occasions, when nothing is concern'd but her own interest. Order is admirably observ'd in that Society, the Temple is well serv'd, modesty is eminent in all her deportment; there is constancy and sweetness, justice and mildness in her mind. Moreover Octavia speaks excellently well of all things, without affecting a certain capacity which reasonable persons cannot endure; and when any occasion is presented for her to speak to the other Vestals, to exhort them to their duties, she do's it with so much eloquence, that they as much admire her wit as they love her person. 'Tis also very considerable, that tho Octavia is a very fit person for the World, yet she continues most strictly confin'd within the bounds of her profession, and which is yet more strange, all her sentiments are heroical; she considers matters very scrupulously, she speaks and writes exactly, and, which renders her infinitely lovely, understands all the dearness of true friendship, and prudently chooses chooses such as she makes happy with her own. She has also the good fortune that the other Vestals are worthy to be with her, especially three, who are all extremely amiable; but there is one amongst the rest, who has a great interest in her heart, and that deservedly: for she is a very rare person, of a graceful and lovely aspect; her birth is very noble, her heart is generous and tender, she is infinitely ingenious, her humour is sweet and complacent, and with all this she has the true aspect of a sincere honest person, and a tender, and a constant friendship for the admirable Octavia, who cannot be commended after all the manners she deserves, because she will not suffer her self to be commended with exaggeration. Yet it must be said further to her honour, that she loves glory passionately, that nothing affects her so sensibly, and when any thinks to commend her before the other Vestals, they say half of the rare qualities she possesses, and the charms which render her so admirable are not known. Do me then the favour which I infinitely desire (reply'd Berelisa) to bring me into the affection of the grand Vestal; you are so accusom'd (answer'd Clidamira tauntingly) to make your self belov'd by whom you please, that, if you have the desire, you need only seek out an occasion to make your self known. You seem to speak obligingly (reply'd Berelisa) but yet I assure you, I understand you as I ought.

After this Valeria having told them it was time to go to the Temple, if they intended to see the Ceremony, these fair Strangers accompani'd her thither. Where being well plac'd they saw Valeria had not flatter'd the grand Vestal, and that she was fairer than she had describ'd her. She perform'd this Ceremony with so much Majesty and so good a grace, that the charm'd all those that beheld her. Berelisa in particular looking upon her as a person from whom she expected to be protect'd, was engag'd to love her from that very moment. Clelia having lost her Predecessor was considering to gain her affection, to the end she might make use of her authority if she should need it; for the Vestals have a great interest in Rome. Plotina also hoping to know more fully by Octavia what her deceas'd Predecessor had spoken concerning her at her death, was solicitous of getting a place in her affection: Thus these several persons for different reasons purpos'd to acquire the friendship of the grand Vestal, who at the end of the Ceremony continued alone standing by the holy Fire, to shew an example to all the other Vestals. The next day a rumour was spread abroad that the enemies Army was upon their march with all speed. This news indeed was true; for the King of Hetruria, understanding the preparations that were making for the defence of Rome, thought fit to give no leisure to fortifie it more; and therefore hasten'd his design. And besides Tarquin himself press'd him so assiduously when he was arriv'd at Clusium, that he gave him no rest. 'Tis true Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines did all they could to protract matters in length; but being unwilling to become suspected, they dar'd not employ all their credit to that end. So that they could not much retard the execution of that grand design; but for that they desir'd at least Aronces might be free, they perform'd their promise made to that illustrious Prisoner, and perswaded Porfenna it was fit he should be brought out of prison on condition to serve in the Army intended for the siege of Rome; and told him; during that time, they would incline him to embrace the propounded marriage of the Princess of Ceri, who was reported to be a great beauty. Galerita having promis'd in the name of Aronces, more than Aronces would have promis'd himself, Porfenna sent order to him who commanded in the Island of Saules to bring Aronces forthwith for Clusium. But when he receiv'd this order, the Prince was not yet return'd from that secret voyage, which he made to Rome, accompani'd with the old man who inform'd Plotina of so many things; so that this man was in a strange perplexity. At first he told him that brought it, the Prince was sick and not to be seen, and that a little time ought to be waited for his recovery, to carry him to Clusium. But tho he set a good face on the business he was in extream trouble, which nevertheless did not torment him long; for towards midnight Aronces according to his promise return'd into the Prison, to go forth again the next morning. For as soon as it was day, it was told him that brought the Order from Porfenna, that the Prince having slept well that night, was something better and would obey the King of Hetruria, and that he might go and assure Porfenna of as much. He was also introduc'd to Aronces, who spoke to him very respectfully of the King his father: but at length when this messenger of the K. Porfenna was gone, Aronces prepar'd himself to depart, and promis'd that Kinsman of Plotina, that he would in that time procure his deliverance out of prison, not doubting to obtain it by his interest in Galerita. But when he consider'd upon the way, that he was going to Clusium, only in order to go and besiege Rome, and that it behov'd him to live with Tarquin and Sextus, he was in extream despair. As for the Prince Titus, he was his friend, and he hop'd some consolation from his presence; but when he imagin'd the war was ready to begin, that he could not think of seeing Clelia so long as it lasted, nor reasonably hope to be happy, he suffer'd more than can be express'd; and if a sentiment of glory had not supported his virtue, he had taken some extream resolution, and could not have resolv'd to go serve Princes whom he despis'd and hated, against people whom he lov'd and esteem'd. But when he consider'd, that Horatius would defend Rome, he felt a secret desire in his heart to be enemy to it, notwithstanding all his reluctancy. With these thoughts Aronces arriv'd at Clusium; as soon as he was there, the Queen his Mother visited him to instruct him in the manner it was fit for him to speak to the King his Father, whom he saw the first time in private. Aronces being the goodliest Prince in the world, Porfenna could not behold him without having his heart mollifi'd, & Aronces was so absolutely Master of it in this occasion, that Porfenna was highly pleas'd with him. Indeed Galerita had prevail'd with the King of Hetruria not to say any thing to Aronces concerning his Love; but that which was most troublesome to Aronces was, that Tarquin and Sextus being then at Clusium, he could not avoid seeing them the same day. 'Tis true, it was in the presence of Porfenna, and so the matter was dispatch'd a little more easily. And besides, Tarquin being a subtle Prince, and one that had a great faculty of dissimulation, and Sextus being of a jovial easie nature, and capable to forget all things past in a moment; they both receiv'd Aronces as if they had always lov'd him, & as the son of a King from whom alone they could expect their reestablishment at Rome. As for Aronces, it was easie to perceive that the respect he would render to the King

King his Father, oblig'd him to receive the civilities of Tarquin and Sextus; he had also the generosity to express some tokens of the difference he made between the virtuous Titus and them, for he deposed himself after another manner towards him in the sight of all the Court. After this Aronces to follow the counsel of Galerita in all things, went to visit the Princess of the Leontines, whom he honor'd infinitely; for out of the design he had, not to be persecuted with the marriage of the daughter of the King of Ceres, he resolv'd to give Porfenna occasion to imagine that the Princess of the Leontines might cause him to forget Clelia. Not but that this kind of Artifice was displeasing to him; but having advertis'd Clelia of it, he resolv'd upon it, with the thought that at least he might often be at liberty to complain of his unhappiness, with a most generous Princess. When he went to wait upon her, he found a Lady there one of the most virtuous in the world, and who was extremely belov'd by her, as well as by Galerita. Her name was Melintha; for her descent being from Greece, her name came also to be of that Country. And being very powerful in this Court by the great number of Friends she had in it, the Princess of the Leontines was desirous Aronces should contract a friendship with her. And accordingly finding her at first gentle, sweet, ingenious, and compassionate, he desir'd to have some place in her affection, and intreated of her so obligingly, that she promis'd it him with joy; for she saw his unhappiness was as great as his virtue, and she was very willing to be one of his friends, especially because she had power to serve him. Upon the return of Aronces all the Court was fill'd with joy, all the young Persons of quality presented themselves to him, the people made a publick rejoicing, and there was no one fair Person, who did not hope to dispossess Clelia of his heart. Yet it was a very rash design, and prov'd very ill to those who attempted it; for Aronces tho civil and complacent, could take no pleasure but in the company of the Princess of the Leontines, with whom he talk'd in freedom, or with Titus, who loving Rome as well as he, pitied him with much dearness, and did not act like a Son of Tarquin, but as a real and faithful friend. In the mean time, as the friendship of Princes, especially when they are young, is easily misconstrued for Love, in a few daies it was reported in the Court of the King of Hetruria that Aronces was become amorous of the Princess of the Leontines, tho he did not profess Courtship to her; besides that, Galerita being desirous Porfenna should believe so, to the end the Prince her Son might be more ingratiated with him, contributed very much to make the rumor credited, notwithstanding Aronces's reluctance, hoping this would hinder the King from urging his marriage with the daughter of the King of Ceres, which was only design'd to disengage his heart from the love of Clelia. And moreover Aronces was so frequently with the Princess of the Leontines, that it was imagin'd that the occasion of it could be no other but Love. Yet he entertain'd her only with discourse of his Passion for Clelia, and the excellencies of that admirable Lady. But as the Courts of Princes are never so splendid nor populous, as when a war is to begin, that of the King of Hetruria was at this time magnificent, and extremely numerous. Tarquin, Sextus and the Prince his brother was there; an old Lover of the Princess of the Leontines was there also, not so much to serve Porfenna as to importune that generous Lady. The Prince of Messene arriv'd there, who was sufficiently surpriz'd when he understood the sister of Artemidorus was there; for it was reported that when she was in Sicily she was amongst the veil'd Virgins. Nevertheless, the case being otherwise, he render'd all the civility he ought her, tho he was Rival to the Prince her brother. Besides all these Princesses, all the people of quality of Tarquin and Veii came to Clnsum; Telanus amongst others repair'd thither, and acquitted himself punctually of what he had promis'd Clelia and Octavius: for he offer'd himself to Aronces as one wholly at his devotion in all occasions whatsoever. Artemidorus and Zenocrates being at Rome, the Princess of the Leontines was very desirous these combustions might be pacifi'd. She wish'd herself able to contribute to this great design, tho she saw no great likelihood in it; but she conceiv'd, if the War could be deferr'd for one year, she might possibly be then in a condition to hinder it; Tarquin was old, and several accidents might fall out to change the face of affairs: She imparted her thoughts to Galerita, who finding she had reason in her opinion, endeavour'd to bring it to pass, that some secret Negotiation might be undertaken. Yet she did not acquaint Aronces with her design, imagining that any thing, which might draw matters out in length would not seem advantageous to him, because Love causes prejudice in the minds of those that are possess'd with it. And accordingly these two Princesses acted with so much address, that Porfenna consented to the attempting to find out some expedient for the accommodating of affairs, to the end the War he intended to make upon Rome, might appear more just, if an equitable proposition were refus'd. Tarquin was extremely backward to consent to this delay, but Porfenna having promis'd him, that this Treaty should last but fifteen daies, he resolv'd upon it, on condition the business might be carried privately, that so in case it should not succeed it might not be reproacht to him, to have ask'd a peace of Rome. Galerita improving this occasion, propounded to request the Princess of the Leontines, who was of a condition fit to intermeddle in such affairs, and had as great a capacity as was necessary for the like transactions, that she would go to Rome, accompani'd with two men of quality. This proposition pleas'd Porfenna, because believing his Son enamour'd on this Princess, he thought she would preserve her conquest, and out of the desire of coming to be Queen of Hetruria, do nothing that might be advantageous to Clelia. The difficulty was, to propound something which might have some probability of succeeding; but several dextrous persons undertaking this affair, it was resolv'd it should be demanded the form of Government should continue Monarchical, that the Title of King should remain to Tarquin, and, that to satisfy the Romans, he should continue a year longer out of Rome, and so should Sextus too, provided the Prince Titus, who was not hated, should be admitted to dwell there. Tarquin did not oppose this proposition; not that it pleas'd him, but because he conceiv'd Rome would never accept it. When Aronces understood the business, he was extremely afflicted at it, but considering it well, he thought it would be advantageous to him, for the Princess of the Leontines to see Clelia. This design was soon put in execution. To which purpose Telanus was chosen to go to Rome, to demand safe conduct for the Princess

Princess of the Leontines. In the mean time Aronces mov'd Galerita to procure the deliverance of Plotina's Kinsman, who was prisoner in the Island of Sauls; she promis'd to do it, and desir'd some time to oblige Porfenna to set him at liberty. Aronces writ to Clelia by Telanus, and Telanus acquitting himself readily of his Commission, brought back all the assurances that were desir'd for the Princess of the Leontines, who knowing the credit Artemidorus and Zenocrates had at Rome, would not have fear'd to have gone thither without any other assurance than that she might have expected from their interest. But at length having receiv'd instructions from Porfenna, and the most passionate expressions imaginable to Clelia from Aronces, who likewise gave Telanus a second Letter for that fair Lady, the Princess put her self upon the way to Rome. In the mean while, Publicola was not sorry for this delay, because it afforded him time to fortifie the City, and provide for its safety. The Princess of the Leontines had in her company, besides Telanus, two men of good years. And whilst this Negotiation was secretly treating at Rome, the Princess was receiv'd there onely as a Stranger come thither only out of curiosity. But Publicola and several others knowing what relation she had to Artemidorus, that her heart sided with Rome, and she was troubled at Porfenna's protecting of Tarquin, treated her in private with all imaginable honours. As for Clelia, she was very joyful for her arrival, out of a thought to get some place in her friendship, and to engage her to be more favourable to her interests. Plotina was also very glad to understand by Telanus, that he who was to inform her what she was, was to be set at liberty. Horatius being ignorant of the great intimacy she had with Aronces, render'd her all the honour which was due to her quality; but as for Themisius, Meleagenes, Herminius, Amilcar, Octavius, Mertigenes, Anacreon, Æmilius, and several others, they waited upon her every day. Clidamira and Berelisa likewise visited her constantly; and, the former desiring to obtain her favour, propos'd several things to her, relating to the conclusion of the peace, and her return to Leontium. Valeria, and Plotina were very diligent in waiting upon her. Sulpicia, Sivellia, and the Aunt of Brutus, who were the principal Ladies of Rome, went frequently to see her, and Clelia took occasion to do the like as often as she could. Artemidorus was very serviceable in rendring this society more free, for he told his sister so many things in commendation of Clelia, that nothing could be added more; and assur'd Clelia so fully of the good intentions of that Princess, that when they saw one another they were presently perswaded of their mutual friendship. The Princess of the Leontines found Clelia so fair, so lovely, and so charming, that she could not but commend Aronces for his constancy; and Clelia lookt upon the Princess of the Leontines as a person so Amiable, and capable to induce to infidelity, that she fear'd it might be dangerous for her interests, that Aronces should see her too often; and this thought made so strong an impression in her heart, that she could not contain from testifying something of it to her one day, as they were discoursing together with very much dearnefs. I confess to (you said the Princess of the Leontines then to her) I am so great a Lover of constancy, that I have hitherto serv'd Aronces to the utmost of my power, onely because I saw he was faithful to you. But after having seen you, I shall serve him with greater ardour, because, having much friendship for him, I should be glad to assist him in the preservation of a good which is of infinite value. For, is there any thing so precious (added she) as the affection of a person endu'd with beauty, wit, vertue, goodness, and fidelity? I beseech you, Madam, (answer'd Clelia) do not extol me so much, and suffer me to take my turn of commending you, and to tell you, I find you have so many charms, that I fear much, lest Aronces become unfaithful. For sincerely I confess to you I know not how he can resist you, and I find you so far above me, that I cannot but look upon you with as much fear as pleasure. Your discourse has too much of Complement (repl'd the Princess of the Leontines) and is so ill grounded) that it would be a piece of vanity to answer it seriously. And moreover, (added she, smiling) you know your self better than you speak; but tho it were not so, and your modesty conceal'd from you part of your charms, yet you are well enough acquainted with the heart of Aronces, not to apprehend it impossible for him to be inconstant, Alas! Madam, (answer'd Clelia) I do not conceive there can ever be any assurance of not being liable to lose a thing, the possession of which is sweet. I agree with you in that, (repl'd the Princess) that it may be fear'd; but I dare say you cannot without injustice apprehend it possible for Aronces to cease to love you. Give me therefore your friendship without scruple, I conjure you, and believe, that Prince has the most tender and faithful affection for you, that ever any person had, and that I am dispos'd to love you with the most sincere and constant friendship that ever was. If it be so, Madam, (answer'd Clelia) I am perfectly glorious; for I look upon you as a person so lovely, that it will be an infinite contentment to me, to think I am lov'd by one that cannot be seen without being lov'd. This conversation would have continu'd longer, if word had not been brought to the Princess of the Leontines, that Publicola desir'd to speak with her. Clelia judging it was a visit concerning affairs rather than of civility, offer'd to depart; but the Princess intreated her to go into a great Closet, which was in her Chamber, with a Lady of quality that came with her, whose name was Amiclea, and who was a person of very much wit. A moment after, Valeria, Plotina, Herminius, and Telanus, came thither; so that there was a conversation not meanly delightful amongst these six persons. But that 'tis a civil custome to discourse with Strangers about such things as they know best, not onely for that reason, but also to understand something unheard of before, all these Ladies address'd their discourse to Amiclea, either concerning the Princess of the Leontines, or the Court of the King of Hetruria. Valeria, also so well understood that she did a pleasure to Clelia, by making a curious inquiry of all that pass'd at Clusum, that she ask't a hundred things of the amiable Amiclea, which otherwise she would not have spoken of. I beseech you (said she to her, after several things, which directly concern'd the Princess of the Leontines) tell us, what Ladies Aronces has most frequently visited since his coming out of prison, and whether it be true, that there are abundance of amiable women at Clusum. There are so many beauties there, (answer'd Amiclea) that handsomeness is there scarce accounted of. Yet that that is not much the custome (repli'd Platina); for amongst young persons Vertue is far less extol'd than Beauty. 'Tis true, (answer'd Amiclea) but it must be spoken, in the praise of our Court, that a Woman who is no more than barely fair, draws some gazers, but does not acquire much esteem. Beauty, no doubt, is lookt upon there; but, above all, agreeableness, wit, excellent deportment, and a kind of secret charm, not consistent with stupidity, are principally sought after. But I beseech you, (said Valeria) answer what I desired of you, and tell me who those persons are Aronces visits most. I assure you, (answer'd Amiclea) tho' that Prince be very civil, and enforces himself to be so, as much as he can; yet it is well enough seen, that his heart is at Rome, that he takes not much notice of what he sees. Nevertheless, there are two persons which he visits very frequently, and who are his principal Friends. The Princess of the Leontines is certainly one, (said Clelia). 'Tis true, (answer'd Amiclea); and the second, is a Lady of quality, who has a very great interest in his esteem, and is so highly consider'd at Court, that there is none more admir'd. Clelia being then very desirous to know a little more exactly who this friend of Aronces was, made a sign to Valeria, who understanding what she meant, requested Amiclea, that she would please to tell her what excellent qualities the Lady had, of whom she spake. You ask more things at once than you imagine, (answer'd Telanus) for Melintha is a Lady of so great worth, that there are few her equals. I beseech you then, (said Plotina smiling) make me acquainted with her forthwith, in the best manner you can. That is, in a word, (added Valeria) all the Company are desirous you would please to make a faithful description of that Friend of Aronces, that we may know, whether or no we ought to fear he loves her more than us. I assure you (answer'd Telanus) if the lovely Amiclea draw her pourtrait exactly, you will find she cannot be lov'd too much, and all the Company will be persuaded she ought to be Aronces's Friend. For my part, (said Herminius) methinks I love her already, I fancy her so rarely accomplish'd. Speak then I conjure you, (said Clelia) and omit nothing, which may serve to make us perfectly know this Friend of Aronces. Since you desire it, (answer'd Amiclea) I shall tell you that Melintha is a Lady of so rare a Vertue, that she deserves to be propos'd for an example to all others; there is something in her heart so noble, so great, so good, so tender, and so heroical, that it may be said the gods have achiev'd their master-piece, in making her. For there is nothing more difficult to find, than a Woman who possesses all the riches together, which go to the making up of a Man of honour, and which accomplish an excellent Woman. The same temper which gives a great heart and high generosity, is not always well accommodated for modesty: that which causes to love exact Justice, does not very often consist with that sweet and sociable complacence, which is so necessary for Ladies who converse in the World. That which gives constancy in important affairs, does not give mildness in less matters, that which makes capable of great actions, does not stoop to certain trifles which are nevertheless a piece of decency almost necessary to women in some occasions. Now Melintha having really in her breast all the virtues of an honourable Man, and all those of an excellent Woman, deserves all the commendations that can be given severally to both sexes. As for her person, tho' she be infinitely amiable, of a handsome stature, and slender, has hair very bright, eyes full of spirit and sweetness, a sprightly, modest, and agreeable countenance, a certain languor full of charms, a peculiar kind of sweetness and tenderness in the tone of her voice, which affects the hearts of those to whom she speaks, and sings after the most passionate manner in the World; yet I may say, all this ought not to be mention'd; and that Melintha's vertue, wit, deportment, generosity, and prudence, ought to be oppos'd to all the other commendations she deserves. 'Tis not without cause that I am impatient to speak of that sweet, insinuating, agreeable, and solid wit, which renders her capable of pleasing all sorts of persons, and which by its extent, capacity, and address, deserves to be interested in affairs of highest importance, which she is able to dispatch with prudence equal to the secrecy and probity of which she makes profession. Never was there a person more faithful, more sincere, or more generous than she. And that which is admirable in this illustrious Woman, is, that, together with that sweet and complacent air she has, and a delicate constitution, she notwithstanding has all imaginable greatness of heart, and is continually as active, as if the strength of her body equall'd that of her mind, especially when she finds occasion to do a civility to any of her Friends, or only to some unfortunate person, of whose merit she is inform'd. She neglects even her own affairs for those of others; she is incapable of ever failing of her word; she expresses humanity towards all miserable persons, her heart is the tenderest in the World, she loves all that she ought to do, and knows how to love, both with choice and constancy. She affects ingenious things, and understands them; as Musick, Poetry, Peinture, and the like; and tho' she is of a temper something inclin'd to Melancholy, yet she inspires a pleasing joy into those who converse with her, and tho' she seems not to intend it, suddenly wins the hearts of such as have the happiness to approach her. But not to suffer the tenderness her heart is capable of to be idle, and to afford her innocent objects worthy of it, the gods have given her an illustrious Husband, illustrious Brothers, illustrious Friends, and lovely Children. But, to her unhappiness, the valiant Belisarius was slain in the Wars, when fortune was ready to reward him for an infinite number of glorious actions, which gain'd him an immortal renown, and render'd him worthy of the love of the virtuous Melintha. In that illustrious Husband she found all that could be desir'd in a Man of honour: He was of a very Noble race as well as she; he had wit and courage; he was good and generous; he loved glory more than all things, and Melintha as much as glory. This generous Lady, hapned to be shut up in a besieged City, which her illustrious Husband defended with excellent valour and resolution, he endeavour'd to oblige her to go away out of it with her children; but she would never desert him, and, as long as the Siege lasted, afforded very great succour unto him. For during the few hours he took to rest in, she made it her care, that the orders of her dear Belisarius might be exactly observ'd, and gave some her self, with as much judgement as a great Captain could have done

Being,

Being very well ascertain'd of her illustrious Husband's conduct, she never offer'd to oppose his courage. So that after Belisantus had defended the place beyond all appearance of possibility, he could not resolve to capitulate, but prefer'd a glorious Death above a Treaty, which notwithstanding could not have been otherwise than very honourable. Nevertheless, a sentiment of dearness for Melintha, obliging him to desire her consent, he propounded to her not to yield at all; and since the City was to be abandoned to the enemies, to make a Sally forth with all the people he had left, and attempt by his valour to make his way with sword in hand, and beat the Enemies at the same time he yielded up the place. The wise Melintha well understood all the danger of this resolution, but perceiving the aversion of Belisantus to surrender, she courageously consented to what he desir'd, and accordingly he dispos'd all things for that design. The Chariots of Melintha and her Children were made ready, and to shew the tranquillity of his mind in the sight of greatest dangers, he took care to cause several things to be put into them, which serv'd only for his pleasure. After which, being oblig'd to call a Council of War, the Officers so urgently represented to him the reasons which should oblige him to render himself without scruple, that at length he made a very glorious Capitulation: and thus the generous Belisantus marcht out of the place, the gaining of which was less glorious to them that took it, than to him that deliver'd it up, after he had destroy'd a great Army before it, and defended it two months, tho it was thought unable to hold out two dayes, and had no other strength but the courage of him that defended it. But to let you further see, that the heart of Melintha was as tender as resolute, amongst so many generous actions as she did, during that Siege, I must at last relate one to you. Her children being in a House which was not far distant from the Walls of the City, it happened one day that the Enemies suddenly bethought themselves to place Engines upon a Tower, which they had erected on that side. So that a great storm of stones was seen to be discharg'd in that place, which by the violence wherewith they were cast, overthrew all they fell upon, and slew such as were struck by them; Melintha was at that time at the house of one of her friends, on the other side of a large place, where that house stood, and seeing the fatal storm and horrible havock made by the Engines, both upon the house in which her Children were, and in the place which it behov'd her to cross to go to it, did not deliberate a moment, but being impell'd by the true tenderness of a generous mother, ran courageously through the hail of Stones to fetch her children out of so dangerous a place, and that with so much ardour and haste, that she scarce made any reflection upon so great a danger, till she had escap'd it; having at that instant nothing else in her mind but to save the life of her Children, and preserve them for her dear Belisantus, whose love she will be eternally sensible of. Which indeed she has in some manner repair'd, by choosing for a very lovely Daughter of hers an illustrious Husband, whose rare valour and activity resembles that of the greatest Heroes, and who by an hundred gallant actions has made it apparent how great a Lover he is of Glory. Besides, Melintha having two Sons very goodly personages, and whose inclinations have appear'd ex-

treemly noble from their infancy, it is to be hop'd they will prove worthy to be Sons of their illustrious Father. Melintha moreover has four Brothers, each of which in their way deserve a thousand praises; she has also Friends, whose virtue is so great, that tho Fortune has been very liberal to them, yet they enjoy much less than they deserve; and perhaps some other occasion will be offer'd, wherein I may present you with a fuller description of all the persons I have mention'd. I beseech you (said Plotina agreeably) since you have the colours and pencils in your hand be pleas'd to draw the portraits at least of Melintha's virtuous Brothers. For my part (said Clelia) I desire onely to know one of her Friends. You ask too much for one day, (answer'd Amiclea); for Melintha has a Friend whom I cannot tell you of without recounting the History of all Hetruria, because the rare virtues of him I speak of are, at this day, one of the strongest props of his Country. therefore I will expect some other occasion, to let you know that incomparable Man, whose virtue is above envy, and whose moderation makes his virtue more eminent; and I will only tell you that Melintha is a Lady, who serves her Friends without interest, without vanity, and with all imaginable zeal. She conceals her self sometimes to do good offices; and I know a person whom she oblig'd after the noblest manner in the World, who durst not speak of the obligation he has to her, for fear of displeasing her, tho he is extremely desirous to testify his acknowledgement of her generosity, by publishing it. In brief, Melintha is one of those Women, who are so rarely found, that no Age or Country reckons above two or three whose accomplishments equal hers. After this that you have spoken (said Herminius) I am her friend for all my life. For my part (said Valeria) I shall not repine if Aronces has more friendship for her than for me. And I (said Plotina) should account my self extream happy, if I could have an interest in her Love. You have reason (said Clelia) since nothing is more desirable, than to have a friend of such worth; for 'tis not only an advantage to be lov'd by such, but the friendship of a person of great virtue reflects to the honour of those who possess it; you are a friend to almost all her friends, and after a manner enjoy her glory as your own, tho you merit not so much as she, and be far inferior to Melintha. Clelia would have proceeded further, if the Princess of the Leontines had not return'd to her; but for that, as she enter'd into the Closet, she heard the name of Melintha, she could not refrain from demanding what the discourse was concerning the most virtuous Woman in the World. And understanding Amiclea had newly finish'd her Character, she confirm'd all that was said of her with a thousand praises. This Princess being a very graceful Speaker, afforded much pleasure to the Company; but she discontented them at length, when she told them her stay would be shorter at Rome than she imagin'd, and that matters were not in a posture to hope for an accommodation. After which she continu'd there only four dayes; during which, Zenocrates durst not visit her constantly, because Clidamira might have been thereby induc'd to do some injury to that Princess. Which occasion'd this inconstant Professor, who seem'd then very sad and pensive, to be suspected of concealing a great Passion under his inconstancy.

Du-

During the four dayes the Princess of the Leontines stay'd at Rome, she us'd all endeavours she could to bring matters to an accommodation, but withal was solicitous to do some office for Aronces with Clelia and Sulpicia; which she perform'd after so handsome a manner, that it could not have render'd her suspected to Porfenna, had he known what she spoke concerning the Prince his Son. But at length the fruit of this negotiation being only apparent in the admiration of the rare accomplishments of the Princess of the Leontines, she return'd without being able to obtain any thing on the behalf of Tarquin, but she went away with the esteem of all such as had seen her. At her departure from Rome, Clelia told her all that a person indu'd with Wit, Love and Modesty could say, to oblige her to perswade Aronces continually, that he ought to be faithful to her: and the Princess of the Leontines on her part, express'd to her all that a faithful friend of Aronces ought to have said, to exhort her to constancy; after which they took leave: Clelia deliver'd a Letter to Telanus, who brought her one; Artemidorus had a secret conversation with the Princess his Sister, concerning their interests, which were not known to any but to Clidamira, Berelisa, and Zenocrates. Telanus bid Plotina farewell with much dearneſs, and they parted so well, as to excite some jealousy in the breast of Amilcar. After the departure of the Princess of the Leontines, preparations for War were expedited in good earnest; for it was judg'd, that as soon as she should be return'd, Porfenna would cause his Army to advance towards Rome. And indeed she was no sooner at Clusium, and had given an account of her Journey, but Tarquin fell earnestly to solicit Porfenna, and gave him no rest, who looking upon it as a great piece of glory to re-establish a dispossess'd King, omitted nothing, that might conduce to the good success of the War. Now did Aronces see himself brought into a condition, which of all things in the World he most fear'd, namely to be with his sword in hand against so many persons who were dear to him: but he had however the consolation to understand a thousand things that pleas'd him from the mouth of the Princess of the Leontines. For she extoll'd Clelia with such exaggeration, and assur'd him so confidently of his being lov'd by her, that he lov'd more than ever: At least, Madam, (said he to her) I have not made an ill choice of the person to whom I have given my self, since you judge her worthy of your esteem; but do not you believe (added he) that if the King saw her, he would excuse my passion, and that I cannot be blam'd, but by those who have forgotten that themselves lov'd heretofore, or such as are so insensible, as never to be capable of loving any thing? Then he spoke to her as concerning Horatius, and askt her, if she had seen him with Clelia; and tho he were not himself jealous, yet he could not but give several tokens of being so. But in brief, how amorous soever he were, it behov'd him to act like an enemy to Rome: Glory no doubt upheld his reason in this occasion; but the interest of his Love was added to it, to perswade him at length, that since it behov'd him to appear an enemy of Rome, it ought to be after a manner which might render him redoubtable, and make him worthy the consideration of either party. So he went to a Council of War, which was call'd before the marching of the Army, wherein it was resolv'd to make only a shew, as if they intended to beleaguer Rome, to see if it were possible to surprize it, and if they who affect'd Monarchy, were in a capacity to make an insurrection; but in case this did not succeed, as in probability it would not, it was determin'd to besiege that great City effectively, to seize of all the avenues, to make sure of Tyber both above and below Rome, and to bring to pass, that the great number of inhabitants that fill'd it, might serve to destroy instead of defending it, by causing a greater facility of taking it by famine. The business being thus resolv'd on, care was taken for a speedy march; but for that Porfenna judg'd there was no great likelihood of taking Rome by violence, and that for that reason the siege would probably be long, he was pleas'd the Queen his wife and the whole Court should follow him, and go to a very stately Castle, not far distant from the place where his Camp was to be, but a few miles distant from the Tomb of the three Rivals, where the unfortunate Calpurnius was slain, and which part of Porfenna's Army had already seiz'd on. To which purpose Galeria, the Princess of the Leontines, the vertuous Melintha, and several Ladies of eminent quality of Clusium, prepar'd to follow the Army, which was gone before. Then it was that an equal desire was seen in either party of gaining Victory. One contriving to assault Rome, and the other to defend it; sacrifices were offered to implore contrary successes; either of them believ'd they had justice on their side, and right to demand the Protection of the gods; but in the midst of so many opposite vows, Clelia and Aronces no doubt wish'd alwaies the same thing. Porfenna approaching near Rome, divided his Army into three bodies, out of a design to assault the City in three several places. The quarter on the side of Janicul. was that where Porfenna and Aronces were on; the second which was opposite to Tiber, was the entrenchment of Tarquin; and that on the side towards Tarquini was taken up by Sextus. At the first appearing of the forces, there were several little skirmishes between those whom Publicola sent to descry the enemies, and those who went to take up the places wherein to encamp. But there pass'd nothing very considerable in them; for Publicola having a design to suffer the enemies Army to weaken themselves before he attempted any thing, contented himself with knowing the true manner of their entrenchment, and keeping himself upon his guard. On the other side, Porfenna desiring to put the Romans out of fear, that so he might upon occasion more easily surprize them, made shew, as if his only intent was to starve the City. He set a guard upon that River, both above and below Rome, he seiz'd upon all the avenues, he caus'd Forts to be rais'd at several distances, to make good the passes more easily; for Rome was not a City fitting to be compass'd about with a Trench, as Tarquin had done at Ardea. In the mean time Aronces, to whom the care of causing those little Forts to be rais'd, was committed by Porfenna, suffer'd extream grief in beholding Rome as an enemy, and wish'd that at least his Rival would come forth to interrupt the works he was causing to be made: that he might have occasion to see him with his sword in his hand. But for that the Romans had laid a contrary design, his desire could not then be satisfied. After Porfenna's Army was encamp'd without any considerable occurrences in making their approaches towards Rome, Ga-

Teritia the Princess of the Leontines, Melintia, and several other honorable Ladies, arriv'd at the Castle which was prepar'd for them; whither, being at no great distance from the camp, Porfenna, attended with many persons of quality, went to to receive them. The Queen of Hetruria had lately receiv'd two young Ladies for her attendants, of infinite beauty, who, whilst Porfenna was entertaining Galerita, and the Princess of the Leontines, under a great porch which belong'd to the Castle, pass'd over a little narrow bridge, which went from the Castle into the garden, and lay cross'd the large ditches full of water. All the other Ladies continu'd in the porch, with several Officers that attended on the King, except two men, very handsome personages, who leaning over the portal where that bridge was, beheld those two fair Virgins, and spoke something to them. But that little bridge breaking on a sudden, the two fair persons fell into the water, and were indanger'd to be drown'd. As they fell, they parted several wayes, one towards the right hand, and the other towards the left; so that there was a considerable distance between them. They were no sooner fallen, but those two men who spoke to them, cast themselves into the water; but instead of separating themselves to succour them both, they leapt in on the same side, and thought only of saving one whom they held up by the robe, and so swimming drew her to land; for the ditches were very deep. The other lookt for nothing but to be drown'd, and had been so indeed, if the great noise had not excited the curiosity of several people to come and see what caus'd it. Upon which, divers persons perceiving this fair one ready to perish, the Captain of Porfenna's guards leapt in with all speed, and saved her life. This accident troubled the whole Court, for these two virgins were generally very well esteem'd of. There also hapned a dispute upon it, between two famous Soothsayers, who were then with the Queen of Hetruria; for one of them affirm'd, the broken bridge was a bad omen; and the other on the contrary maintain'd, that the bridges being broken upon the arrival of the King, was a very happy presage, and that for his part, he was perswaded if Rome were attacked by force, the enterprize would succeed. But whilst these two Soothsayers were in this contest, the two fair virgins were carried half dead into the same chamber, where care was taken for their recovery. The same evening the King return'd to the camp; but the next morning Aronces went to see the Queen his Mother, and the Princess of the Leontines. In the mean time the accident befallen the two fair virgins, was all the discourse of the Princesses and the Camp; every one wonder'd at the ill fortune of her who was ready to perish, and the happiness of the other, who had two men to succour her, while her companion had none at all, though she were as fair and lovely as she. Tho' Aronces had no purpose to stay long at the Castle, yet he could not refuse to accompany the Princess of the Leontines to the chamber of those two fair virgins, who were still indispos'd by their adventure of the preceding day. As they were going thither, they found the two men in a gallery, who had succour'd the same person, and left the other in danger of perishing. Whereupon the Princess of the Leontines not being able to refrain from testifying to them her astonishment, I beseech you said she to them) tell me why you did not separate your selves to succour both those fair virgins, since they did not both fall on the same side. Was it because you both love her whom you succour'd, or hated her whom you left to perish? Or rather was it because you were lov'd by the one and hated by the other? Your question Madam (answer'd he whose name was Æmylius) is more difficult to be resolv'd than you imagine. For my part (answer'd the other who was call'd Theanor) I should be more troubled to resolve it, than my companion; but which is the worst of all (added he) I dare not enter into the chamber of her whose life I endeavour'd to save, because she whom I abandon'd is there too. And I also (said Æmylius) should willingly go and desire pardon of her whom I left to perish, but for that I fear to find her whom I have serv'd alwaies unjust, I cannot resolve to do it. That which you say seems so intricate (reply'd Aronces) that I am perswaded nothing but love can be the occasion of this perplexity. You have reason, my Lord (answer'd Theanor) and were we free both from hatred and love, we should be more happy than we are, and speak more intelligibly. But because we are possess'd with both these passions, we desire to be excus'd from making our selves further understood. The Princess of the Leontines perceiving these two Lovers had no intention to tell her more of the matter, left them, and went into the chamber of the two fair sick persons, hoping to draw a little more light from them, of what she desir'd to know. One of them was in bed, and the other stood by, undrest; for she who had been longest without succour, was more indispos'd than her companion. There was at that time in their chamber, onely Porfenna's Captain of the guard, who had followed Aronces, and sav'd the life of the fair Terentia, who was in bed, and seem'd to be more sad than sick. She who stood by, and whose name was Aurelisa, to testify the greater respect, went to meet the Princess of the Leontines, and Aronces; but tho' she had reason to be cheerful enough for having escap'd so great a danger, yet there appear'd some discontent in her eyes. Upon which the Princess observing Terentia's sadness, and Aurelisa's discontent, demanded of them the cause; For (said she obligingly) my intention in coming was to rejoice with you; and, yet to judge of your thoughts by your looks, it seems the Prince and I ought to be afflicted, if we intend to partake of your sentiments. For my part (answer'd Terentia faintly) I do not look upon life as so great a Good, as to deserve much joy for not having lost it: however, I am very much oblig'd to Cereontus, whom you see there, for having preserv'd me, since his intention was to do me a very good office, to which he was not so much oblig'd as the other, who left me to perish. As for what concerns me (answer'd Aurelisa) it seems I have been more happy than Terentia; but in reality, I am not of that opinion; for it is sometimes more unacceptable to be too much oblig'd, than too little. I assure you (reply'd the Princess then, looking upon Aronces) I do not much better understand what Terentia and Aurelisa say, than what Æmylius and Theanor said to us, as we came hither. How? (said Terentia blushing) are Theanor and Æmylius here? Yes (answer'd Aronces) they are here, but tho' they were desirous to follow me, yet they dar'd not enter into your chamber. No doubt, (added the Princess of the Leontines) because they dare not see you, after having left you in danger of perishing. In truth (reply'd Aurelisa, changing colour as well as Terentia) I conceive ceive they knew not what they did when they leapt into the water to save my life, and I am not certain but that they might take me for Terentia. As for me (said Cereontus then respectfully, as he was going away) my intention cannot be doubtful, and I very well understood I desir'd to succour you; but, least you should believe I look for praises for it, I shall retire. The more you speak, the less I understand, (answer'd the Princess of the Leontines) yet it would be very fitting (said Amiclea who accompanied the Princess) that you knew the truth of this adventure, for fear some inconvenience happen upon it. You so well understand all the secrets of Aurelisa's, and my heart (answer'd Terentia), that it will be easie for you to satisfy the Princess, but, to speak truth, it were better to conceal our weakness than publish it: upon equitable consideration, I think there is no person amongst us but has their fault. Terentia spoke this with an air that augmented the Princess's curiosity, who understanding in effect, that there might be some occasion of quarrel between Theanor, Æmilius, and Cereontus told these two fair persons, she would not go forth of their chamber, till she knew exactly, all that was to be known of their adventures. I beseech you, Madam, (said Aurelisa then) do not give yourself the trouble of hearing a hundred unprofitable trifles, which are glorious to no persons, and will but make you lose time which you might better employ. No, no, (said Amiclea then) the Princess can do nothing more delightful to her self, than to hinder such worthy persons as those that sav'd your lives, from quarrelling; as I foresee they will do, if care be not taken to observe them, and suppress part of their resentment. Terentia and Aurelisa understanding in effect, that a quarrel might easily arise between those three men, consented to the desire of the Princess and Arances, who having two hours still to spend in that place, was not unwilling to employ them in hindering amorous persons from destroying one another; for he had heard it confusedly spoken, that Æmilius and Theanor lov'd Terentia and Aurelisa. Wherefore urging these two fair Ladies to consent that he should know their history, they did so, on condition that only the Princess of the Leontines and himself should know it, and that they two might not be present at the relation, which they could not hear without extreme confusion. But who then shall tell us your adventures (said the Princess)? Amiclea answered Terentia, who knows them as well as our selves, and who is so sincere, and so faithful, that I do not conceive she is suspected by Aurelisa, more than she is by me: You have reason (answer'd that fair Ladie) and I should more doubt my own memory, if I were to relate my adventure my self, than I do the sincerity of Amiclea. I am very glad you both know me (reply'd she); but withal, you ought to be assur'd that I will do nothing to render my self unworthy of the good opinion you have of me, and onely relate the pure and naked truth. After this, the Princess of the Leontines went to her own Chamber, whilst the Queen of Hetruria was in hers with the generous Melintha. As soon as the Princess was there, she commanded, No person should be suffer'd to enter, and then oblig'd Amiclea to relate all that had befallen her two amiable friends; in obedience to which command she began her story in these terms:

The HISTORY of AURELISA

I will not detain you, Madam, with telling you Aurelisa and Terentia are descended from very noble families, since you know it already; or that Theanor, Æmilius and Cereontus are persons of quality; for 'tis a thing you are not ignorant of. I shall omit to tell you that these five persons are indued with great merits, because you know them sufficiently to be so; nevertheless, for that the Prince that hears me has not time to observe the humour of Aurelisa and Terentia, you must permit me to tell him that tho' Terentia be brown and Aurelisa fair, one has black eyes, and the other blew, one be tall of stature and the other low, yet there is more difference in inclinations than in the out-side of their persons. Yet they have both very much wit; yea, they had for some time a considerable kindness for one another; but this has not hinder'd but that they have opposite sentiments, and in brief, can never agree in any thing whatsoever, not even in such matters as are of least concernment. If they be onely to walk together, one of them will go in the shade, and the other says she do's not fear the Sun, and much affects those great open quarters in Gardens which leave the sight free, and where the air is not confin'd. If one will have her Curtains drawn before her windows, the other maintains on the contrary that the clear day is advantageous to such as have a good complexion. In brief, they never had the same friends of either Sex in the very time they lov'd one another, and I may say I am the only except on to this general rule; 'Tis true, since 'tis a happiness I have to be oftentimes a friend to persons who have no resemblance, and whose interests are many times contrary, this ought not to be wonder'd at. But which is strange, these two persons, whose opinions are so different have yet so much reason that they never had any publick fallings out, and they have so well conceal'd their differences that I am almost the onely person that have had any knowledge of them. In the next place, Madam, you must know, that these two persons having both almost in the same time lost their Fathers and Mothers, they were plac'd under the Guardianship of a man of quality, call'd Tolumnius, whose wife was Aurelisa's Aunt. As for Terentia she was Cousin to Tolumnius, who had two Nephews, not Brothers, to whom he intended to marry these two Virgins who have sufficient fortunes. In order to which, he educated them under his wife, whose name was Elinysa, tho' he conceal'd his determination; however, he so expressly commanded Æmilius and Theanor, (who obey'd him as if he had been their Father) to insinuate themselves into the affection of these two persons, that they began to make Courtship to them, more out of obedience than choice, and consequently without Love towards them, or jealousy between themselves; for they had other things which affected their hearts. On the other side Aurelisa and Terentia having been advertis'd by one of their relations, that they were to prepare themselves to marry Æmilius and Theanor one day, lookt upon them as two men who in time might come to be their husbands. But as they could never love the same things, so they made different desires; for Terentia wish'd she might be lov'd by Æmilius, and

Aurelisa that she might be so by Theanor. Nevertheless, these wishes were conceal'd from all the World, and they never spoke of them but when they were alone. Nor did they then think that they spoke very seriously. For my part (said Aurelisa one day) I shall never resolve to become wife to Emilius: not but that I see he is a person of much honour, but he is not such as I would have a Lover or a Husband: but the case is otherwise in relation to Theanor. As for my particular (added Terentia) I cannot think of marrying Theanor, tho he be a person of worth; but for Emilius, I could easily resolve to do it. What? (said Aurelisa) would you be the wife of such an inconstant person as Emilius, who has had a hundred Mistresses in his life. I would not marry him inconstant, (answer'd Terentia) but I should like well enough to cure him of his inconstancy, and should not be loth to marry him when I had render'd him faithful. But can you your self (added Terentia) resolve to love and to marry Theanor, who you know loves a certain woman ever since he came to the use of reason, who makes a profession of being the most constant person in the World, and yet when he has marry'd you, will not cease to love his former Mistress? No, no, Terentia, (repl'd Aurelisa) I do not understand it so; but, to speak freely, I should take as much pleasure to render Theanor unfaithful to her that he loves, as you would have, in rendring Emilius constant. Our two wishes are very different (answer'd Terentia) for I desire to remove a defect from Emilius, and you would confer one on Theanor. In truth (repl'd Aurelisa) I think we do not yet very well know what we would have; but the best I see for us, is, that in all probabilities we shall never desire the same things, and so having different pretensions, we shall always live in peace, tho our inclinations be contrary. However from that day Aurelisa and Terentia found arising in their hearts a kind of particular esteem for those two men, which had scarce any other apparent cause than the desire of contradicting one another. For, because Aurelisa esteem'd Emilius less than Theanor, therefore Terentia lov'd Theanor less than Emilius; and for the same reason, Aurelisa knowing Terentia prefer'd Emilius before Theanor, she gave the preheminance to Theanor to the prejudice of Emilius. Nevertheless, they so well conceal'd their sentiments, that they were taken notice of by no person whatsoever. But whilst they contested thus, Emilius and Theanor who were friends, and mutually communicated most part of their sentiments, beheld these two Virgins as most men do those whom they think they ought to marry, that is with an affection without ardour, and little better than ordinary civility; nor did they so much as inquire how their Uncle intended their marriages should be made; for Emilius having at that time three or four Mistresses, and Theanor one who absolutely took up his heart, they onely consider'd that they whom they were to marry would be rich, without troubling themselves further, except that they told their Mistresses, A wise man ought to marry only for his familie's sake, and to love onely for his own. They endeavour'd also to persuade them, that a marriage was not a real infidelity; and they were happy enough to be believ'd; for the inconstant Emilius lov'd none but Gossips, and the constant Theanor loving a woman which could not be his, he persuaded her the more easily to what he desir'd. Things being in this posture, I contracted an intimate friendship with these two young Beauties, and I hapned one day to be at Elinysa's house with whom they dwelt, when Theanor and Emilius came thither with two Ladies of no discommendable beauty. So that this conversation being wholly compos'd of young persons (for Elinysa was gone out of it about some affairs) it suddenly became very agreeable and gallant. This hapned so much the more easily, for that one of the Ladies who came with Theanor and Emilius, and whose name was Cleonia, being much addicted to make sport with her best friends, and to do it sometimes a little too pressingly; cunningly brought it in, to speak of unfaithful and constant Love, intending to give some light gird to those that were with her. She ask'd the other Ladies what they would do if they were necessitated to chuse a husband of two men, whereof one had a hundred Mistresses, and the other but one, whom he loved ardently. For my part, said one of the Ladies, I would have neither of both; for certainly 'tis no great pleasure to be wife to one of those profess'd Weather-Cocks, who because they converse with none but Gossips, slight their Wives, and every day do a hundred things very displeasing to be seen; and 'tis yet less to be Wife of a Man who every moment is ready to sacrifice all his family to the person whom he loves, whose thoughts are wholly taken up with her, who never stirs from her, who is weary of all other places, who is prodigal in what concerns his love, and covetous in all other respects, and who will not have any thing that he do's, seen; or when it is observ'd, will not allow it to be complain'd of. And which is strange, both that husband who lends out his heart to whomsoever will have it, and he that gives his intirely to one person, do nevertheless require their Wives should keep a more exact fidelity to them, than any others. But since I may be mistaken (added she) I would know Aurelisa's opinion upon this case. Terentia then lookt upon Aurelisa, calling to mind what they had talk'd of together some daies before; whereupon, (perceiving it was believed, she was going to declare her true sentiments, and consequently to determine, that she lik'd a Husband better that had one constant Love, than one that had many) on a sudden to have the pleasure of deceiving her friend, she disguis'd her sentiments, and took the contrary side, with intention to anticipate all that she desir'd to say. For my part, (said she, smiling) I see no ground there is to doubt; for 'tis better, no question, to be Wife of an unconstant Husband, provided he carry his business discreetly, than to be a Wife to a constant Lover, who perplexes his Wife with continual capricious. For inconstant Lovers, are almost generally of a good humour, whereas, on the contrary, Lovers scrupulously faithful, are for the most part sullen natur'd. Terentia observing Aurelisa's subtlety, could not restrain her self from contradicting her, tho in reality she contradicted her self. There is some wit in what you say, (said Terentia) but yet it is certain, that it were incomparably better, to be the Wife of a man who has a great passion, than of one of those that are inconstant to a thousand Loves, of whom every day a hundred stories are told, which divert the whole Court, and perplex his Wife in all companies, since she can scarce scarce go into any place without finding some Mistress of her Husband's with whom she is at a loss how to comport her self: but it is not so with a Husband that has but one Love; for provided you keep but some measure of civility to his Mistress, if he be ingenuous he will thank you for it, and if he does not love you, yet at least he will esteem you. While these two Virgins maintain'd the side they undertook, which is sufficient weakness, because it did not agree with their real sentiments, Theanor and Æmilius, to whom this conversation was displeasing, by reason of their being concern'd in it, believ'd that these two fair persons thought what they spoke, and thereupon Theanor was incens'd against Aurelisa, and Æmilius against Terentia. And either of them desiring to make good their side, produc'd all the reasons for it they could invent. For my part, (said Æmilius) I see not how the thing can be doubted; for I conceive nothing is more troublesome to a Wife, than one of those Husbands with a great passion, & nothing more convenient than one that is a Gallant. For he is scarce ever at home, some Feast alwaies takes him up, and, as he is unwilling to be constrain'd, so he gives the same liberty which he desires to take. On the contrary, a Husband of the other sort, is insupportable; for out of cross intention, that he may have something to blame in the deportment of his Wife, to the end that may excuse his own, he has continually his Spies to observe her. But however, (interrupted Theanor) the Husband you represent so, loves some person, and so his Wife has some ground to hope, if he can cease to love his Mistress, her self may at length get into his affection. But what can be hop'd from an inconstant person, who is never capable of loving any thing? If he do not love his Mistress (said Æmilius) why should his Wife take it ill? But if the Husband who has a constant Love, (answer'd Theanor) does not cease to use his Wife civilly, what reason has she to complain? since you do not believe it necessary to her happiness, that she be lov'd. For my part, (said Aurelisa, contrary to her own sentiments again, because she had begun so) I am against Theanor: And I (added Terentia) against Æmilius. In my apprehension, (said I then) you are not against any body; for to speak sincerely, you do not well know what you would do, if both of you had Husbands, which did not love you. It is not material for what reason you are not lov'd; since in what manner soever the matter is, it is alwaies troublesome. However, whether you be lov'd or hated, you ought for Virtue's and your own sake, to be as faithful to a Husband that does not love you, as to one that does; for it is not fitting ever to revenge your selves to his prejudice; nor to offend by example. No doubt Terentia and Aurelisa thought the same thing that I spoke; for they are both very discreet; but they were in a manner not to agree to it, to the end they might have occasion to contest. Nevertheless, seemliness restrain'd them, and so the conversation ended; after which, Theanor went away with a secret indignation against Aurelisa, and Æmilius against Terentia, tho in truth Æmilius was oblig'd to love Terentia, and Theanor Aurelisa. When they were return'd home, (for they lodg'd together) they fell to speak concerning these two Ladies, and resolv'd between themselves, that if their Uncle should oblige them to marry them, Theanor should marry Terentia, and Æmilius Aureli-

sa. In the mean time, these two fair Virgins being retir'd, Terentia ask'd Aurelisa why she would not speak her mind really? 'Twas to hinder you from speaking yours, (answer'd she, smiling) for I conceiv'd you would not be of my opinion. But by obliging me not to speak what I thought, (reply'd Terentia) you did not speak your own thoughts, 'Tis true, (said she) but do not you know, that sometimes the mischief you do others, compensates us for part of that we do our selves? You may judge, Madam, by what I say, in what condition things then stood. But how weak soever this beginning of aversion was which Æmilius had against Terentia, and Theanor against Aurelisa; and how slight soever an inclination Terentia had for Æmilius, and Aurelisa for Theanor, these first impressions were the true cause of all that have befallen them since. For Theanor after having had so long and constant affection in his Soul, was insensibly cur'd of that Love by another, and had a great dearnefs for Terentia, alwaies remembring the sentiments he had observ'd in her mind, at the time of that contest, at which I was present. About the same time too, Æmilius being weary of the turmoil, occasion'd by the necessity of entertaining several gallantries together, accusom'd himself to take more pleasure than usually in the company of Aurelisa; and thus these two friends by degrees became very amorous of the two fair Virgins. But by a strange crossness of Fate, the first inclination of these two persons continuing, and being not alwaies able to restrain themselves from bearing envy one towards another, Terentia could not endure Theanor, and wist so ardently Æmilius would love her in stead of him, that she seem'd to love him already. Aurelisa on the other side, accounting Æmilius insupportable, desir'd Theanor would please himself less with the company of Terentia, and more with hers. Not but that these four persons were every day together; but it is often seen; that tho persons be in the same place, their hearts are far distant from those in whose presence they are. However they all conceal'd their sentiments, and not knowing precisely in what manner he on whom they depended, would dispose of them, they expected till he declar'd his mind; every one of them desiring in their hearts, his pleasure might not check their respective inclinations. But it was in a short time perceiv'd, that some change hapned in the minds of Æmilius and Theanor; for the ancient Mistress of this latter, being possess'd with extreme jealousy, utter'd several expressions, which intimated that Theanor could not but have an other Love. All the Mistresses of Æmilius did the like, and within a very few daies it was generally talkt of, that Theanor was became unfaithful, and Æmilius constant. It was also added, that the cause of the constancy of one, and of the infidelity of the other, must needs be in Elynissa's house; but however, it could not be conjectur'd, whether it were Aurelisa that Æmilius lov'd, or whether it were Terentia that had cur'd Theanor of his first passion: for these two Lovers not knowing the intention of their Uncle, durst not declare themselves, and liv'd in partial civility towards these two Ladies, for whom they had notwithstanding very different sentiments, and by whom likewise they were lookt upon after a very different manner. I being then their intimate friend, inform'd them of the rumour that was reported concerning the constancy of Æmilius, and the unfaithfulness of Theanor, and ask't them for whose

whose sake Theanor was become unfaithful, and Æmilius constant. For it is not doubted, (added I) but 'tis for the sake of you two, that these Lovers have chang'd inclinations. For my part, (answer'd Terentia suddenly, and blushing) I know not whether Theanor loves me, but I know well Æmilius does not. I am very well assur'd, (said Aurelisa,) Theanor is not faithful for my sake; and as for Æmilius, I care little for knowing wherefore he ceas'd to be inconstant, that I have not at all taken notice of it. Yet I wonder, (added Terentia) you have not observ'd, that he takes more pleasure in speaking to you, than to me. I assure you I have taken notice of it, (answer'd she), but I have observ'd upon divers occasions, that Theanor uses all his address to avoid discourse with me, and seeks to place himself near you, as often as he can, without doing me incivility. If it be (so repli'd Terentia coldly) I have reason to complain and pity my self, and I wish Æmilius be more happy than he. If he have any such intention towards me as you speak of, (answer'd Aurelisa) he will not be more happy than his friend nor I than you. In truth (said I to them then) I see not, however the business be, how either of you can be unhappy; for Theanor and Æmilius are both such deserving persons, that you cannot make a bad choice of either of them. They were going to answer, but these two Lovers enter'd, who, to confirm what they had spoken of, handsomely sought to place themselves according to their inclinations. Æmilius approacht near to Aurelisa, and Theanor to Terentia. At which both of them blusht; which the Lovers observing, interpreted to their own advantage, (as persons, in their condition, use to take all occasions of flattering themselves) tho in truth it was to their prejudice. For Terentia blusht out of spight, to see that Æmilius prefer'd Aurelisa before her self, and Aurelisa out of anger, to observe that Theanor neglected her in respect of her friend. However, being both intelligent, they suppress'd their sentiments, and the conversation was nevertheless sufficiently agreeable at the beginning. For coming to speak of gallantry, the question was put, whether that love were greater that could not contain from declaring her self, or that which was conceal'd out of respect. Terentia being in a great fear lest Theanor should tell her he lov'd her, and more, lest Æmilius should declare his mind to Aurelisa, made haste to answer that there was no cause of doubt, and that there was more love in not telling that one loves, when respect alone causes the Lover's silence, than in going to tell it with precipitancy. Aurelisa now found her self a little perplext; for she lov'd not to be of Terentia's opinion, and was as unwilling to take upon her to maintain, that it was fit to declare one's love, for fear of encouraging Æmilius to tell her something that might not please her. Therefore she chose rather to say nothing of her self, but asked me, What I thought of the case? For my part who had no interest in it, I spoke sincerely what I thought of the matter, and endeavour'd to maintain, that a Lover who could restrain himself from declaring that he lov'd, had a less passion than he who in spight of the respect he bore to his Mistress, and in spight of his own reason, was enforc'd to profess that he was in love. Æmilius was of my opinion, and Theanor intending his silence should be a declaration of his love to Terentia, maintain'd the contrary, and was of her opinion: So that this dispute lasted for a good time. For my part, (said I) I confess to you, I fear people who are not able to contain from saying they love, have nothing in their hearts which torments them very much; and there is no surer token of a luke warm affection, than the long silence of a Lover. For, is not complaint an infallible sign of great sorrowes? little diseases are easily pastover in silence, but the wisest complain of such as are great, and all the Philosophy of the most insensible persons, can scarce ever keep from crying out when they suffer very much. So that as, no doubt, it cannot be prov'd that silence is a sign of great pain in the body, no more can it be made out to be an evidence of great grief of mind. But, do you make no difference (said Theanor) between a great love and a great pain? No, (answer'd I); for, besides that I am perswaded there is no love without inquietude, which is a kind of pain, I am so also, that a Lover who has not declar'd his passion, has so vehement a desire to tell it, that he suffers one of the greatest torments in the world. You have reason, Amiclea (said Æmilius to me) and I can answer you, that for certain it is the greatest misery that can be imagin'd. 'Tis no doubt a great trouble (repli'd Theanor) but for that reason it is a great sign of love; for is there any thing more obliging to a Lady, than to make her know, that the fear of displeasing her, and the respect you have for her, obliges you to be silent, and to suffer without complaining? and besides (added he) to speak equitably, was a Lover ever believ'd upon his word? and if he does no more than say, I love you, would any Lady in the world believe him? And if so, the best way or course to prove one's love, is by a thousand cares, and a thousand services, sighs, glances, and a thousand other wayes more effectual than words, without offending a fair person, who will not have the respect due to her, lost. Believe me (said I then to Theanor) the sighs, glances, cares and services you speak of, may be compar'd to metal, (of which not long since money has been made at Rome) whose value is redoubled by the Prince's stamp. For all that is done for a fair person before a man discovers himself to be a Lover, is lookt upon but as testimonies of esteem and friendship at most, and, till after such declarations, she does not look upon the services render'd to her, as testimonies of love. What you say, is, no doubt, very well spoken (said I to him) but it must be added, that when people are forbidden to speak, 'tis taken for no great offence if they break that prohibition, in case they be esteem'd, and they knew how to do it handsomely. But, Amiclea (answer'd Terentia) I think you have lost your reason, in accusing women of such a defect as this; For, I conceive, a deserving person can never be more oblig'd than when she fees her displeasure is dreaded, and that she is fear'd and respected. 'Tis true (repli'd I) but if a Lover do not profess himself to be such, how will he ever be lov'd? I know not whether he will be lov'd or no (answer'd Terentia) but I know well, that a Lover who should tell me rudely that he lov'd me, should be hated. When Amiclea (repli'd Æmilius) maintains it fit for a lover to declare his passion, she does not mean he should do it after an unhandsome manner. As I was going to answer, the Lady which Theanor had lov'd so long, arriv'd with two others; her name was Menefile, and it is not to be doubted, but she is a very confident person, and passionate. This visit very much much surpriz'd the company; for she did not ule to visit Elyssa. But jealousy exciting a desire in her to see what pass'd in this cabal, she caus'd her self to be introduc'd by one of Tolumnius's friends. Nevertheless Theanor the better to make known his love to Terentia, continu'd with her, tho he did not speak to her apart, for should he have desir'd it, she would not have given him occasion. When Aurelisa beheld this Lady enter, she well understood that a sentiment of jealousy induc'd her to make this visit; so that perceiving she still lov'd Theanor, this redoubled the inclination she had for him, as well as the envy she bore to Terentia; for she was extremely sorry that she was not the person to whom he prov'd unfaithful. A quarter of an hour after, three of Æmilius's ancient Mistresses arriv'd; but he saluted them so coldly, and lookt upon them so little, that it could scarce be thought he had ever seen them before. Whereupon Terentia observing that this unfaithful person was become constant, was extreamly perplexed it was not for her sake that he despis'd all his former Mistresses. And so she became as melancholick as Aurelisa. However, civility obliging them to entertain those that came to visit them, they fell to discourse of several things; after which the conversation being chang'd on a sudden, they inveighed very much against men in general. It was affirm'd that they were very frequently unjust, vindictive, inconstant, insensible, and given to distraction. Theanor and Æmilius then maintain'd the cause of their own sex, defended themselves the best they could. But at length, I know not how it came to pass, but one of the new-come Ladies, who did not love Menefile, askt me if I believ'd that a woman whom a man ceas'd to love, ought to be more offended than another, who could not gain the affection of a man she lov'd. This proposition made Menefile, Terentia, and Aurelisa blush, which nevertheless was observ'd only by my self. Menefile recollecting her self in a moment, had confidence enough to make good her own cause. 'Tis so easie to answer to what you demand (said she) that tho many persons be present here, who have more wit than my self, I think I shall have enough to convince you, that 'tis greater shame not to be able to make one's self be lov'd, than to be abandon'd. For the shame reflects upon the desertor, and not on her that is forsaken. I know not whose the shame is (repl'd I) but I believe the anger is on her side that is relinquish't, if she persists to love. I believe (said Menefile) the cause of the anger is for having been deceiv'd; but however, a person that cannot make her self be lov'd, is not only angry, but ashamed of her own weakness: and whereas a woman that has been lov'd, and is so no longer, is possessed onely with despight, hatred, and contempt of her Renegade; she that loves without being lov'd, comes at length, when she has any heart, to hate and despise her self; which, no doubt, is the cruellest thing in the world. While Menefile was speaking thus, Terentia, Aurelisa, and Theanor, were extremely perplext, being inforc'd to hear an unpleasing discourse, without answering to it. I observing their trouble, answer'd Menefile and desiring to make a third party, In truth (said I to her) whether a woman loves without being lov'd, or whether her Lover forsakes her, she is worthy of pity if she be vertuous; for as for such as are not, they ought never to be pitied. But I would know further (said she who made this proposition) who suffers most of the two. She that loves most (answer'd Terentia). That is likely (repl'd a Lady of the company) to be the forsaken Lady; for I cannot understand that he that is not lov'd, can love very ardently. For my part (said another) I do not conceive a woman can love, if her affection be not answer'd when she gives some Testimony of it; but I do not believe it impossible but a vertuous person may have a secret and hidden inclination which may lead her to love rather one man than another; tho without testifying any thing of it. If it be so (answer'd Menefile) I believe really she that is forsaken suffers more than she that is not lov'd; but if she believes that her eyes have betray'd the secret of her heart, and that he that she loves understands her affection without answering to it, I conceive she undergoes the torment of a shame of greater pain to her, than the blackest infidelity can cause. For in this case the remedy is at hand by scorning him from whom the injury is receiv'd. Whil'st Menefile was speaking thus, Æmilius talk't low to Aurelisa, who at that instant lik't rather to hear him, than to be oblig'd to answer Menefile. You are very melancholick to day, Madam, (said he to her) altho I do not complain of your silence; for it being a kind of consent, I presume you agree that Amilcar had reason to say: There is greater love in not being able to contain from discovering that passion, than in being silent out of respect; and therefore to avoid giving you leisure to change your sentiments, it is best for me to tell you in the most respectful manner possible, that of the most inconstant of all men you will make the most faithful Lover in the World, provided you will please to fasten the Knots which tye me to your service. I beseech you, Æmilius, (answer'd Aurelisa much astonish'd) do not force me to speak more rudely to you than I would: you know I have respect for Tolumnius, and that I should be extream sorry to displease him. However if you accustom your self to speak to me as you do, it shall be hard but I will find out wayes to deliver me from your importunity. Aurelisa spoke this with a certain severe aspect, which sensibly afflicted Æmilius; but in stead of being repell'd by it, he became more amorous; for he was one of those to whom the difficulties of things encrease the desire of possessing them. Wherefore he spoke again to Aurelisa to the same purpose, but so respectfully, that she had no pretext to be offended with him. On the other side Theanor observing all Menefile's discourse was only to despight him, design'd to take advantage of her anger: so that when all the company was gone, he continu'd last, and approaching to Terentia who was musing by a window, If you remember, Madam (said he to her with a low voice) all that you have heard spoken indirectly against me, remember also at the same time, that I have suffer'd it for your sake; and that if I had not an infinite respect for you, I should tell you, that did I not love you, I should not be unfaithful. I assure you (answer'd she) I will alwaies remember the quality you give your self, to the end I may not be endanger'd to love you more than I do; for in brief a man that can forsake one woman for another when he is lov'd by her, may prove unfaithful to all that shall put confidence in him. After this, going aside to Aurelisa, Theanor was constrain'd to go away without saying more to her. The rest of the evening Terentia and Aurelisa were sufficiently melancholick, they undrest themselves almost without speaking to one another, tho they lay in the same Chamber, and it was not till the next morning that they spoke any thing. When, after they were dress'd, according to their custom, they went into a little Closet not far from their Chamber, expecting the hour to go to the Temple. As soon as they were there, Aurelisa (who naturally was more debonaire than Terentia) ask'd her with a something forc'd smile, whence it came to pass she was so pensive that day; For (said she) they ought not to be melancholick who have gain'd a victory. You ought then to be more frolick than you are (answer'd Terentia) for you have triumph'd more gloriously than I. If you will change your victory (reply'd Aurelisa) I am content. I assure you, it shall not be my fault (answer'd Terentia): not that I absolutely agree to what I perceive you think; but I answer to your words rather than to the truth of the business you set upon me for. But I shall alwaies draw this advantage from what you have said, that I see Emilius has mention'd his love to you, and I did not convince him yesterday. I acknowledge it (reply'd Aurelisa, knowing it would afflict Terentia): but now confesse to me whether Theonor did not make you know he loves you; and that as I have made a faithful Lover of an unconstant one, you have made a man unfaithful who was reputed the most constant in the World. Your sincerity requiring the like from me (answer'd Terentia) I confesse to you, Theonor made me understand he loves me. Ah! Terentia (said Aurelisa) why have you not made Emilius your Lover? Ah! Aurelisa (say'd Terentia) wherefore have you not gain'd the heart of Theonor, which I know not what to do with? The misery is (added she) that I perceive 'tis Tolamnius's absolute pleasure we should marry his Nephews; and that, according as your heart and mine are dispos'd, we shall be alwaies unhappy. For I tell you again, I shall never be able to live with Emilius, tho he is a person of merit. I say the same of Theonor (answer'd Terentia). After this, the like unhappiness uniting the hearts of these two Virgins, they promis'd much friendship and fidelity one to another. But, in order to seek some remedy to their hard fortunes, Terentia promis'd Aurelisa alwaies to treat Theonor ill, and never to marry him, what command soever Tolamnius should lay upon her to that purpose, whom she obeyed as her own father. And Aurelisa likewise promis'd on her part, never to speak any thing favourable to Emilius, nor marry him, whatever command should be lay'd upon her to it; they promis'd also to relate sincerely all that those two Lovers should say to them. But alas! (said Terentia) all our providence will perhaps be unprofitable to hinder us from being unhappy; for it is in our power not to marry those we do not love, but if it should be propounded to us to marry those we do not hate, perhaps we shall not be able to refuse them, tho they do not love us; and 'tis possible Theonor and Emilius will have the weakness to obey Tolamnius out of a regard to their interest. However, I confesse to you, I should think my self as unhappy to marry a man who should not love me, and I should affect, as to marry one whom I had no affection for, and lov'd me. You have reason (answer'd Aurelisa). But since hope is not to be disclaim'd to the last, we ought to hope that being united as we are at present, it may fall out that we may change our destiny; Emilius may come to love you, and Theonor not to hate me. After this they made a thousand caresses to one another, and express'd a thousand blandishments. At the end of this conversation they went to the Temple, where their two Lovers were, who confirm'd by their looks what they had spoken the day before. At their return from the Temple, they were told, one of her Friends desired they would go in the evening into the Gardens of the Palace, whither, as you know, Madam, the whole Court resorts very frequently in fair weather. Accordingly they went thither with a Kinswoman of theirs, imagining their Friend would take the pleasure to walk with them; but they found it was to hear musick-entertainment which Theonor and Emilius had prepar'd for them, and that she in whose name they were requested to come, knew nothing of this gallantry; which, instead of exciting joy in them for whom it was intended, afforded them but regret and discontent. Some daies after, these Lovers gave a magnificent Collation to the same persons, in that delightful Grove which is call'd the Grove of the Spring, because the verdure appears there sooner than any other where, and all the World resorts to walk there in that season: and to make their love more taken notice of, one evening they gave a Ball under a magnificent Tent in the middle of that Meadow, which is call'd the Meadow of Flora, because indeed it is always cover'd over with flowers. Terentia and Aurelisa were at a desperate loss with these contrivances of their two Lovers to please them; but yet it behov'd to be present at all their entertainments for fear of displeasing Tolamnius and Elmyssa. Not long after, they were joyful to understand that Tolamnius had resolv'd to go and spend some time in the Countrey at a very fair house of his near Chusum. They understood also that I was to be of the company; and accordingly I departed two daies after with them upon which occasion, as friendship is more speedily contracted during a little journey into the Countrey than in the City, they were pleas'd to make me privy to the fear they were in, lest Tolamnius should determine to marry them after a manner contrary to their own inclinations; and, in brief, they told me all the principal secrets they had in their breasts. I confesse to you they caus'd me to pity them, and finding an occasion to intermeddle with love innocently, I promis'd to do all I could to change the hearts of their two Lovers, who were both my familiar friends. During our Countrey-journey, there was nothing but continual feasting; but these two Virgins desiring me not to desert them at all, that so their Lovers might not have the liberty to speak to them apart, I did it indeed so handsomely, without Emilius and Theonor's ever suspecting my design to hinder them from discoursing to them, that they could not say any thing to them concerning their passion. I did not content my self with doing this office to these two Virgins, I spoke severally to both their Lovers, in order to perswade them into sentiments contrary to their own. For speaking to Emilius I extol'd Terentia with exaggeration, and did the like for Aurelisa speaking to Theonor. But, to speak truth, I did not observe they commend'd them with the same ardour. On the contrary when I spoke of Aurelisa to Theonor he spoke to me of Terentia; and as soon as I nam'd Terentia to Emilius, he mention'd Aurelisa to me. In the mean time these two Lovers were so solicitous to get get themselves lov'd, that they did not perceive they were lov'd by those whom they did not affect. Tistrue, Terentia and Aurelisa being both discreet and vertuous, they conceal'd their sentiments the best they could, and did not cease to seem pleasant, to be sociable, and shew an equal civility to those for whom they had very differing sentiments. That which render'd them the more unhappy, was, that tho Theanor were in love with Terentia, yet he did not cease to live much in favour with Aurelisa; and tho Amylius lov'd Aurelisa, yet he was much complacential towards Terentia. Now it falling out that these two Lovers had Affairs at Court, they made but little journeys on a day. They made very urgent requests to Aurelisa and Terentia that they would permit them to write to them, but they would not grant it. Yet I, who lov'd news well when I was in the Countrey, desir'd one of my friends who was one of theirs too, to send me not only what he knew at Clusium, but likewise all intelligence he should receive from any other place, for he was one that had correspondence throughout all Italy. Not that I car'd much what pass'd in places where I knew no person, but Tolumnius loving to know all that was acted all the World over, I was willing to divert him during my residing at his house. And accordingly, that Friend of mine several times sent me very ample relations of all that pass'd at Court, with the extracts of Letters which he receiv'd from Rome, Veii, Tarentum, Cumæ, Volaterra, Panormus, Capua, and divers other places. So that this affording divertisement to Tolumnius, and the news of the World giving sufficient pleasure to Terentia, Aurelisa, and my self, we awaited with much impatience the day that we were to receive Letters. One night we went to walk, expecting their arrival, and thinking to have them a moment sooner. And as we were between two Meadows border'd about with Willows, we saw him arrive who was wont to bring my Packets, and who now deliver'd me several. Amongst the rest, I beheld one which I did not know, so that the desire of knowing who writ it, caus'd me to open it first; which done, I found it was a relation divided into distinct Articles like those I was wont to receive, tho I did not know the Character of it. Terentia and Aurelisa observing my astonishment, approach't toward me; and all three of us sitting down at the foot of a Tree, I began to read the relation which was in effect the same I am going to repeat to you; for I know I shall not alter the sense; however, I may something change the words.

Of the Court.

Persons envious, discontented, and ungratefull are alwayes to be found here; they to whom any thing is given, believe they deserve more; they to whom nothing is given, think that rob'd from them which is given to others; in the mean time all the World is oftentimes in a hurly burly without knowing wherefore. There are found there ambitious persons without merit, flatterers ill rewarded, false friends resembling true, an out side of goodnesse which charms new-comers, and yet do's not deceive them who have experience; in brief, imposture and fraud is seen every where, and handsome deportment without honesty. As for love, there is little can be call'd so; altho sometimes certain frivolous loves are to be seen there, which are fit only for young idle persons that know not what to do, and many times too know not what to say. Loves of interests are seen there likewise, which inspire onely unworthy actions, and there is scarce ever any sincere love to be found unlesse it be in the breasts of Theanor and Amylius, whose hearts they say are in the Countrey, tho their persons are seen every day at the Queen's Palace, where they appear so melancholy that all the Ladies complain of them.

Of Clusium.

All the envious Fair ones rejoice here, for the absence of the two fairest persons in the World; yet they do not draw much advantage by it: for all worthy persons are so afflicted with it, that all their conversations are turn'd into sadness. There are some who affirm two of their Loves are in danger to die of sorrow if they do not speedily return, tho it be not the custom to die for the absence of a rigorous Mistresse; Otherwise, Clusium is as it is wont to be, that is, the powerful oppresse the weak; every one seeks that which pleases him; those which govern are repin'd at, projects and designs are contriv'd to no end, little true vertue is to be found there, but much hypocrisie, disorderly magnificence, excessive avarice; injustice, irregularity and confusion.

Of the Gardens of the Palace.

All the Ladies who were wont to pull down their Veils, when they fear'd lest their beauty should be constrain'd to yield to that of Terentia and Aurelisa, walk with open countenances during their absence; but for that the image of those two fair persons remains in the hearts of all those who have judicious eyes in relations to beauty, they have never the more admirers, and the remembrance of those who are no more seen there, still prejudices the glory of those that are.

On the Grove of the Spring.

Tho all the Trees be here as green as usual, yet there is much lesse company than was wont; not but that there are still a hundred thousand Birds which make the most delightfull melody that can be heard; but the reason, no doubt, is, for that the crowd of honorable persons who came to walk here the last year, came not so much to hear the Nightingals sing as to behold the two fairest persons of the Earth, who were seen there almost every day. Now, instead of them, two melancholick Lovers are seen very frequently there, who came to sigh in the most solitary places of the Grove. Sometimes they loose themselves in it, their griefs so possess them; and there are some also who assure they have made very amorous Verses which have been found carv'd upon the Trees, by which it appears that one of them loves a handsome fair woman, and the other a beautiful brown. However, this Wood appears so solitary, that there is cause to believe there will be no more resorting to it, if those two fair ones who are absent do not speedily return.

On the Ball, upon the evening of Juno's Festivall.

All sorts of people are seen here; some dance well, others ill, and many others do not dance at all. There are seen also several Ladies who ought not to dance more, because 'tis too long agoe since they begun to dance. There are young people too, who begin to see the World by the Ball, and are so out of countenance, that they cannot dance according to the right cadence. Here are also knots and factions, tho the design oftentimes is onely to dance ill. But, what is most resented, is, that the fairest ornament of the Assemblies at Clusium is no longer seen here, namely Terentia and Aurelisa. And 'tis for the same reason, that Theanor and Amilius are not seen here, who like better to be in solitude by themselves than to be seen at the Ball, where they cannot see the only persons that can please them.

On the Medow of Flora.

All the World is much amaz'd, not to see any longer here that abundance of Flowers which were wont to be seen every year. Indeed, they say the West-winds, which serve to maintain the freshnesse of Flowers, have follow'd those two fair ones that love them, and that this is the cause the Medow has almost no Flowers this year. They speak of sending to request them to return; but very many beauties oppose it, because they like better the Medow should be without Flowers, than to see the admirable complexion of Aurelisa and Terentia outshine the lustre of their own.

On the Temple of Venus.

A great sacrifice is preparing here for two unfortunate Lovers, who cannot be lov'd by their Mistresses, tho they have the most ardent and faithful passion in their breasts that ever was. There are some believe, that if they do not resolve to reward their fidelity, the Goddess they adore will revenge their deaths after a strange manner; for 'tis the custom of this Goddess, when she is offended with Ladies rebellions against the Laws of her son, to take away their beauty immaturly, or cause them to love without being lov'd. Therefore 'tis to be wish'd, those two fair persons would reward their Lovers for being so faithful. If they do so, they shall be happy in the highest degree, nothing being more sweet than to love and be lov'd, nor nothing so miserable as not to love at all.

Well, (said I to Aurelisa and Terentia, after I had done reading this news) What think you of that which you have heard? Me thinks, (answer'd Terentia) to my great discontent, Amilius has a great wit. How? (reply'd Aurelisa roughly) do not you know 'tis Theanor that made this gallantry? For my part, (said I to them) if you ask me what I think, I shall tell you I believe it belongs to them both in common, that they have joyn'd their braines together, that they have both contriv'd the design, and afterwards caus'd it to be written by an unknown hand. No, no, (answer'd Terentia) 'tis not Theanor that writ these news; no question he has much wit, but it does not lye this way, and 'tis only Amilius that could invent this folly. On the contrary (reply'd Aurelisa) it looks so like Theanor's, that I cannot be mistaken. However it be, (said I to them) if the Author of this Gallantry be doubtful, the cause of it is not so too, and you may easily judge that it was made for your sakes. Alas! (answer'd Terentia) what am I the better, if this contrivance be ingenious and handsome, if Love inspir'd Amilius with it only to divert Aurelisa? Good gods, (reply'd that fair Virgin) what advantage is it to me, that Theanor had a hand in this agreeable folly, since you were the only occasion of it? 'Tis very strange, (said I to them) that by these news it cannot be known, whether Theanor intended it to Terentia or Amilius to Aurelisa. Alas! (answer'd Terentia) the matter is not dubious; for after what they have told us, they conceive we easily make the application of what they write. However, all their wit is very ill bestow'd in the manner they employ it. But wherefore (said I) do not you both strive to conform your minds to your fortunes, and to love them that love you? Ah! my dear Amiclea, (cry'd Terentia) how happy are you in being ignorant of the power of a vehement inclination! and how cruell (added Aurelisa) in thinking we do not do all we are able, to love those that love us! At least, I know I have omitted nothing to effect it, nor neglected any endeavours to love Amilius, and hate Theanor. I have done more than you, (answer'd Terentia) for I have attempted to bring my selfe to that passe, as to be only indifferent for both, and I could never effect it, and notwithstanding all my endeavours, I have still an inclination for Amilius and aversion for Theanor. However, out of respect both to Vertue and Seemlinesse, both the one and the other ought to be equally conceal'd, for fear of offending Tolumnius; and that which renders me more miserable, is, that I believe, if Amilius knew I did not hate him, and you did, it is possible he would love me. I have believ'd as you do, (reply'd Terentia) that if Amilius were not ignorant of your aversion against him, and the inclination I have to love him, in all probability he would love me; but at present I believe it lesse than I did. Therefore that which pleases me most in this Gallantry of Theanor and Amilius, is, that these two Lovers however suspect nothing of our weakness towards them, and so I may see them without blushing; for if they had had any such suspicion, they would not have said in this last Article of news, that when Venus is offended, she punishes the fair ones, that have disobey'd her, by causing them to love without being lov'd. In truth, (answer'd Aurelisa) our destiny is sufficiently intricate; for according to all probability we are likely to be very unhappy. After this, she took the pleasant news that was written to me, and read it over from the beginning silently, whilst Terentia was in a deep musing, and I stood by observing them both. After Aurelisa had read the packet, Terentia took her turn to read it too; and tho it was sent on purpose to divert them, yet it made them both very sad. Nevertheless, they had some consolation the next day; for Tolumnius speaking to me in private, told me he had a purpose to marry Terentia and Aurelisa to his Nephews, and therefore desir'd me to know of these two Ladies what their inclination was, it being more just (as he said) to know the true sentiments of those which ought to obey, than of those who are to command. Wherefore (taking this occasion to do a service to my friends, tho it were against the inclination of my two of the other Sexe) I told him it was not necessary for me to speak to Terentia or Aurelisa, and that since I understood them better than they did themselves, I could assure him Terentia would never be happy, if she marry'd Theanor, but that she might be so with Amilius; on the other side, that Aurelisa would be miserable with Amilius, and very well satisfi'd with Theanor. If it be so, (reply'd Tolumnius) it will be easie for me to content them; for Theanor and Amilius will not dare to disobey me; and besides, (added he) I believe their hearts are free enough at present, not to make any resistance to my commands. Moreover, both Terentia and Aurelisa are so well educated, that it will be no difficulty for them to comply with my pleasure. I thought to tell him then that he was mistaken, mistaken, but I was afraid to speak too much; and therefore I left the matter in this condition, and went to find my Friends. Terentia presently blush'd at what I had said, but Aurelisa thank'd me for it; for I see not (said she) how any inconvenience can follow upon this adventure; for if Theanor and Emilius readily obey, it will be a sign the passion they have for us, will not be strong enough to hinder us from hoping to be lov'd by them; and if they absolutely refuse to obey, indignation will cure us, and perhaps lead us to admit of the affection of them that love us. For my part, (said Terentia) I hope nothing, and I fear all; but when all is done, the case having no remedy, must be resolv'd upon. The same evening these two Lovers desiring to know how their news was taken, arriv'd, and made shew as if they knew nothing of it. But I being desirous to oblige them, commended that Gallantry before them; I shew'd them it, and I brought them at length to confesse in secret, that they had contriv'd it together, as I had imagin'd. After all the Company was retir'd, Tolumnius did not fail to cause them to be call'd, that he might tell them what he had resolv'd upon. You know (said he to them) what command I lay'd upon you, to accustom to visit Terentia and Aurelisa, and that 'tis my pleasure you should marry them; but since it is hard for a Man to be contented with the deportment of his Wife, if he be not lov'd by her, I have observ'd and caus'd the inclinations of the two persons I design for you carefully to be noted by a person of their familiarity. So that it shall be your own fault if you be not happy; for in brief, I know Terentia has for you (said he, looking upon Emilius) all the inclination a vertuous Virgin can have for a Man whom she looks upon as he that is to be her husband; and I know also (added he, speaking to Theanor) that Aurelisa has a deareness for you, which ought to oblige you to prefer her readily before Terentia. Is it possible, my Lord (answer'd they both at once) that you should be well inform'd of that which you speak? Doubt not of it, (reply'd he) and conform your selves to my will; for tho' you should have no great affection for these two Ladies, ye must think of nought but to marry them. They are fair, young, prudent, and rich; and that's sufficient. If you do not love them before you marry them, you will love them after; as well as it oftentimes falls out, that they who love their Wives before, come shortly after not to love them at all. Marriage and Love are two things, which are not frequently long together; and therefore determine only to obey me, for all my estate is for them who obey me, and not for others. As for what concerns me, (reply'd Theanor) no respect of interest shall ever cause me to do any thing. And for my part, (added Emilius) nothing can ever induce me to marry Terentia. For, in brief, (added he) since it equally concerns Theanor and my selfe, to let you know the truth, we ardently love Terentia and Aurelisa. But, my Lord, 'tis because we love them that we cannot marry them in the manner you propound to us; for Theanor loves Terentia, and I love Aurelisa. But since Aurelisa loves Theanor, (reply'd Tolumnius) and you are lov'd by Terentia, it concerns you to enforce your sentiments; for it is much more dangerous for a man to marry a Wife by whom he is hated, than it is for him to marry one whom he loves not, if he be lov'd by her, especially when she is fair and wise.

However it be, (said he to them) I will not lay any constraint upon the two young Ladies, whose Parents at their death left them under my Guardianship. But since you depend on me, and have a thousand obligations to me, and since I can ruine you when I please, you ought to yield to my will: do so if you be wise; for assuredly you shall repent your selves if you do otherwise. Tolumnius spoke this with an aspect of choler, which hindred Theanor and Emilius from answering him; besides, having made them a sign to retire, they were constrain'd to go forth of his chamber to their own, but with so much affliction, that they spent the night without sleeping: for Tolumnius having told them he knew the inclinations of Terentia and Aurelisa, they imagin'd it was an artifice of those two Ladies who hated them, to put an obstacle to their design. The next morning they were so sad, that never was a day pass'd after a more melancholy manner than that; for Tolumnius was possess'd both with grief and indignation; the two Lovers were alike in despair; and Terentia and Aurelisa were both equally afflicted and ashamed. Not long after Tolumnius told me, it very much troubled him, to find that Theanor and Emilius had dispos'd of their hearts otherwise than they ought, but he intreated me to say nothing of it to Terentia and Aurelisa, and assur'd me he knew well how to make himself be obey'd. Yet this news did not rejoyce these two fair Ladies, from whom I thought I ought not to conceal it; for when they came to consider, that if Tolumnius persecuted Theanor and Emilius, they might be hated by those whom they lov'd, their minds were in a strange perplexity. On the other side, the two Lovers, who were intimate friends, were in an unconceivable trouble; for if they resolv'd to obey, they should marry Women whom they did not love, either of them remaining amorous of one another's Wives. You may easily conceive that this gave them no small affliction. Indeed in this condition they knew not what to say, either to her that they lov'd, or to her that they did not affect. Wherefore they chose rather to return to Clusum, than to continue in a place so unpleasant to them. Their departure offended Tolumnius, and sensibly afflicted Terentia and Aurelisa. Sometimes they had sentiments of hatred, sometimes thoughts of love, and scarce ever any other than apprehensions of despair. For my part, I did all I could to appease Tolumnius, and to comfort the two afflicted Ladies; but at length the time was come to return to the City, where all these persons were in a new perplexity. Before Tolumnius had spoken to the two Lovers, they did not perceive that themselves were very much hated or lov'd; but after he had told them they were not lov'd at all, and yet that they were not hated, they wonder'd they had no sooner understood the truth. When Theanor beheld Terentia, he observ'd in her eyes a forc'd civility, which caus'd him almost to dye with grief, and when he look'd upon Aurelisa, he saw in hers something so sweet and modest, which intimat'd so much obligation, that he wonder'd he had not before perceiv'd it. Emilius on his part, when he look'd upon Aurelisa, perceiv'd such a kind of fierceness in her eyes, that he could not see her without discontent; but he observ'd obliging languor in those of Terentia, tho' he avoided her looks as much as he could, that it made him think himselfe still more unhappy. Having taken notice of these different sentiments

ments, the two Lovers became more miserable; for before they comforted one another, but after that time they had severall fallings out, and accus'd one another unjustly, for the causes of their unhappiness. But yet from time to time, the equality of their ill fortune reunited them, and they contested again as often, and were possess'd with jealousy, altho they had no cause for it. For sometimes Theanor accus'd Æmilius of not being displeas'd for being too much lov'd by Terentia, and presently after Æmilius reproacht to Theanor, that he was glad for being lov'd by Aurelisa. In the mean time they were possess'd with so violent a passion, that they could not resolve ever to obey Tolumnius. Who being an imperious man, was extremely disgusted with them, inasmuch, that he said publickly, he would give all his estate to Terentia and Aurelisa, and marry them to others. And no question it was easy to find persons that would marry two fair, young, rich, and virtuous Ladies; in order to which he propos'd to match Terentia and Aurelisa to two men of quality, who were amorous of them. But these two Ladies requested him with very much generosity, not to take away his estate from his nephews, and refused to marry the persons he propounded to them, telling him, that if the business were once accomplished, they that should marry them, would not require what he gave them, and that for their parts it was not possible for them to resolve to see two such deserving persons as Theanor and Æmilius, unhappy, for their sakes. However, 'tis certain Love had a share in their generosity, and it was not in their power to marry two men whom they did not love. Tolumnius esteeming them the more for this deportment, hated his nephews more, who on the other side were desperate at so generous actions, because they found it did not prejudice their love: for their passion increased from day to day, and they were so unhappy, that I could not but commiserate them. Mean while, they to whom Tolumnius pretended to marry these two fair virgins, looking upon Theanor and Æmilius, as the obstacles of their happiness, did not see them but with trouble and indignation; and Æmilius and Theanor on the other side, considering them as persons that intended to make advantage of their unhappiness, sought occasion to quarrel with them, which they soon found, and sought. Theanor encountred him that was to marry Terentia, and Æmilius was matcht with him that was to have Aurelisa to his wife. The first of them mortally wounded his enemy, and Æmilius disarm'd his. Indeed their victory cost them dear; for they were both very much wounded. This combat further increased the anger of Tolumnius, and caus'd much grief to Terentia and Aurelisa: for the latter was afflicted to see Theanor ardently lov'd by Terentia, and the former was so, to observe how much Æmilius was enamor'd on Aurelisa; but these two Ladies were much more troubled when they understood their two Lovers were in danger of dying. For, being possessed with great discontent, their wounds became sufficiently dangerous, and it was believ'd they would dy, tho their strength was still very vigorous. However, Tolumnius would not see them, but Elinysa visited them without her husband's knowledge. During their weakness, Terentia and Aurelisa omitted no obliging care towards them both, without distinction. The two lovers requested Elinysa, she would please to let them see their fair Mistresses before they dy'd. Who being good and compassionate, promis'd them they should, and entreated me to persuade my friends; whom with no great difficulty I brought to consent to it, not knowing but in this condition the two Lovers would resolve to render justice to their affection. They requested me that I would be one in this sad conversation; and Tolumnius being then at his house in the Country, Elinysa lead us to the lodgings of these unhappy Lovers, either of which desir'd to speak one after another to their Mistresses. After the first civilities, I betook my self to discourse with Elinysa, whilst Theanor was speaking to Aurelisa, and Æmilius to Terentia. I desire your pardon, Madam, (said Æmilius to her, by whom he was lov'd) for the trouble I give you; but I find my self so unhappy, and so criminal, that I have not been able to refuse my self the consolation of justifying, or at least excusing my self to you. For, in brief, Madam, when I first began to visit you, I observ'd my friend lov'd you; and I have alwaies found him so deserving a person, that I could not doubt but that he was lov'd again. Wherefore suffering my heart to be surpriz'd by the charms of Aurelisa, I was not in a condition to dispose of my self, when I understood you had an aversion against Theanor, tho he had a great passion for you. However, you have not ceas'd to be good and generous; and, to perfect your being so, (added he), pardon me a crime which I cannot yet hinder my self from committing, and save the life of an illustrious friend, to render justice to the affection Theanor bears you. For, in brief, amiable Terentia, I do not love Aurelisa more ardently than Theanor does you. I wish to the gods (answer'd she sighing) I could love Theanor, I should be more happy than I am; but however, I can assure you I pity you both, and am much afflicted I cannot contribute to the felicity of either. Alas! Madam, (reply'd he) for my part I seek nothing but to dy a little lesse criminal in your esteem, and a little lesse hated by the charming Aurelisa. I understand you well (answer'd Terentia blushing) and I will make you see that it is not my fault that you are not happy. At these words this fair virgin arose up, and told Aurelisa, Æmilius desir'd to speak with her. Upon which Theanor, who had an extreme desire to speak with Terentia, told her with much civility, he conjur'd her to go and revive his friend, by giving him some small hope. Aurelisa not daring to refuse, because Elinysa was present, went accordingly to speak with Æmilius whom she affected not, after having had a conversation with Theanor, almost like that which he had had with Terentia. When she approacht to him, Well, Madam, (said he to her) shall the unfortunate Æmilius be hated when he is a dying? and shall he not have at least the consolation to think that you will pity him, and that if Theanor dyes as well as he, all your tears shall not be spent upon that ungrateful person, who loves you lesse than another Lady, very amiable indeed, but yet much lesse than you? Terentia (answer'd Aurelisa) is more amiable than I, and you are so oblig'd to her, that you are as unjust in not loving her; as I am unjust in not loving you: But, in brief, we are not governors of our own destiny. However, believe that I pity you, and if I could render you happy, I would do it with joy. You may at least let me dy with some consolation (reply'd Æmilius) by permitting me to believe that you would not hate me, but only because you love Theanor; and that, if you lov'd him not, you would perhaps look upon me more favourably. After this, Madam, I shall desire nothing more of you. Whilst Æmilus was speaking thus to Aurelisa, Theanor us'd all the sweetest and most affecting expressions to Terentia, that the most tender love could inspire him with; but this Ladie's mind being disturb'd, for having found nothing but generosity in Theanor's heart towards her, answer'd him so negligently, that this afflicted Lover was ready to die at that very instant, and lost his speech through the excess of his grief. But tho' Terentia was extremely perplex'd to understand how ardent Æmilus's affection was for Aurelisa, yet she left Theanor very hastily, and came to help Elinysa and me to succour him; inso-much that not being able to suppress his complaint, O gods (cry'd he lifting up his eyes to heaven) with how many torments, would I have deserv'd Æmilus's death? In speaking which, this furious Lover offer'd to pluck off all that was laid upon a wound he had receiv'd in the left arm; whereupon Aurelisa leaving him by whom she was lov'd, to go to succour him whom she lov'd, tho' he did not affect her, restrain'd his hand; and, making use of the power her friend had over him to withhold him. In the name of Terentia (said she to him) taking him by the hand, restrain part of your grief, and believe (added she, transported by an excess of tenderness, which the danger she saw him in, excited in her heart) that it shall not be my fault if Terentia do not render you happy. Yes, Theanor (continu'd this afflicted beauty) since you cannot live for me, and cannot live without her, I will become the Confident of your passion, and serve you with her, tho' it be to act against my self. Alas! Madam, (said she to her) 'tis enough that I die with grief, without causing me to die with confusion. Leave an ungrateful person, leave me to die, and succour the unfortunate Æmilus, who adores you, and dies only for your sake. As we were in this perplexity, word was brought to Elinysa, that Tolumnius was fallen sick at his house in the Country, and sent for her to come to him. So that it was requisite to depart, which nevertheless we did not do till after Æmilus was recover'd from his swoon, and those that attended on them were call'd for. But in fine, Madam, (to shorten my relation as much as I can) these two Lovers were cur'd in spite of themselves, and Tolumnius dy'd in the Country; but at his death he gave all his estate to Terentia and Aurelisa, and requested Elinysa to do the like at hers, if Theanor did not marry Aurelisa, and Æmilus, Terentia. These two generous Ladies after the death of Tolumnius, would not accept what he had given them, Terentia resolving to confer her part on Æmilus, and Aurelisa hers on Theanor. But they being as generous as their Mistresses, refus'd this high munificence. Theanor told Aurelisa, it was sufficient he could not give her his heart, without taking away from her an estate which belong'd to her, and Æmilus said the same to Terentia; inso-much, that Elinysa has been constrain'd to take care of all the estate of Tolumnius, till these four persons resolve what they will have her to do with it. The relations of Aurelisa and Terentia after the death of Tolumnius desir'd to take away these two Ladies from Elinysa, and place them about the Queen, where they have been ever since, with sentiments of equal affection, without being able to succeed in changing their hearts; tho', during four months, Theanor, Æ- milius, Terentia and Aurelisa, have done all they could to overcome themselves. In the meantime Terentia has not omitted to do any good offices for Æmilus, nor Aurelisa for Theanor, either with the King or Queen; so that, with the consent of these two Lovers, I may say there is no person in the world to whom they have so much obligation, as to these two Virgins, whom they can never love. 'Tis true, Theanor has more obligation to Aurelisa, than Æmilus to Terentia, because she has really done all she could, to persuade this fair Virgin to marry him. And therefore 'tis a sentiment of gratitude, which caus'd that Lover to act, as all the Court has seen, when they were in danger of being drown'd. For you must know, Madam, that yesterday whilst the King was speaking to the Queen and you, Terentia and Aurelisa passing out of the porch to the bridge which lies over the ditch to go into the garden, Theanor and Æmilus, who attended on the King, were leaning against the gate to speak to them; and, as (persons that love never speak but what has relation to their passion, when they can) these two Lovers were rejoicing that the Queen being near the Camp, they could at least have the consolation of seeing them sometimes during the War. Theanor offer'd to speak some obliging words to Terentia, who rejected him uncourteously to speak to Æmilus who was on her side, tho' his heart was Aurelisa's. So that this unhappy Lover, not being able to discourse with her he lov'd, was oblig'd to speak to her that lov'd him. For my part (said Theanor) all the joy I have in the Queen's being near the Camp, is, that if I die at the siege (as I wish, since I can never be happy) Aurelisa will hear of my death one day sooner, and have the contentment, to see her self delivered from an ungrateful person. However, (answer'd Aurelisa) then I have cause to reproach you, that 'tis not my fault that you are not happy even at the loss of my own felicity. As she ended these words, the bridge broke, Aurelisa fell on the side where Theanor was, to whom she had spoken so obligingly, and Terentia fell on the side of Æmilus. I having since discours'd with those two Lovers, am inform'd what they thought in that occasion, in which their passions and their reasons had a contest of a moment's duration, which caus'd them to act after a very different manner; for Theanor finding himself on the side where Aurelisa was fallen into the water, his first thought was to succour her: for having his mind then fill'd with what she had spoken so obligingly to him, the affection he had for her, the thousand offices he had render'd her, and the thousand rigours of Terentia, which excited indignation in him, gratitude carried him at that instant above his love: Inso-much, that out of generosity he leapt into the water, and went to succour Aurelisa, by whom he was lov'd, and whom he did not love. At the same time, Æmilus, tho' he saw all imaginable dearnefs in Terentia's eyes for him, and had a thousand obligations to her, no sooner beheld Aurelisa in the water, than forgetting all he ow'd to Terentia, and all the rigours of Aurelisa, he did not deliberate between his gratitude and his love, but cast himself into the water as well as Theanor, to succour Aurelisa, whilst the poor Terentia was ready to perish in the sight of one Lover whom she lov'd, and another who lov'd her. But to her good hap Cereontus, who was alwaies believ'd incapable of love, was found to have a conceal'd passion for that Lady, which he discover'd very opportunely to save her life : for, as you know, Madam, if he had not leapt into the water to rescue her, she had without question been drown'd. Thus, Madam, you understand the adventure of Terentia and Aurelisa, but that which is rare, is, that Terentia, who found no lover to succour her, has at present two, who pretend notwithstanding to dispute her affection ; for Cereontus affirms, Theanor has no longer any right to Terentia ; and Theanor maintains, that the excessive gratitude he had for Aurelisa, is a pure effect of the innocent love he has for Terentia. But as for this fair Virgin, I assure you, she is to be pitied. Who ever saw (said she to me last night) a misfortune equal to mine ? for is there any thing more cruel, than to see one's self deserted in a great danger, by a man that is lov'd more than all the rest of the world ? and withal by another, that has sworn to me so long, that he loves me a thousand times above all the rest of the earth ? As for Aurelisa, she is much more happy than I ; they whom she hates, and they that hate her, save her life ; but as for those whom I love, and those by whom I am lov'd, they equally abandon me ; and for my last unhappiness, the insensible Cereontus comes to rescue me from death, to the end to make me better feel all the rigour of my misfortune, and to prepare also a new persecution for me. But, Amiclea, (said she to me again) I will equally hate both him that I lov'd, and him that lov'd me ; and since ingratitude has not hindred Aurelisa from being succour'd by Æmilius, I will be ingrateful to Cereontus too, and, instead of giving him thanks for having sav'd my life, I will accuse him of part of the miseries which I suffer. Yea, I will hate him too (continued she) for my weakness is the true cause of my misfortune ; and, according to my present sentiments, I find nothing in the World but what is worthy to be hated and scorn'd. On the other side he us'd such expressions, that he could not but be pitied. Aurelisa too complain'd she was more oblig'd than she desir'd to be. And Æmilius looks upon himself as more unhappy than before, since the services he renders do not make him lov'd the more : and Cereontus also is in a strange fear, lest Terentia prove unjust towards him. Wherefore, Madam, it lies in your prudence, and that of the Prince, to hinder such brave persons as these from quarrelling, and to seek some remedy to the unhappinesses of two Virgins so amiable as Terentia and Aurelisa.

Amiclea having finish'd her relation, found it was not unprofitable ; for Aronces promis'd to take a particular care of those three Lovers ; and the Princess of the Leontines, of the two amiable persons who caus'd the unhappiness of the rest by their own. After which, they went to the Chamber of the Queen of Hetruria, and Amiclea return'd to that of the two afflicted Virgins, with whom she found Theanor and Æmilius, who after having deliberated a long time were at length enter'd into their Chamber, tho' Terentia was unwilling to see either of them. Theanor was upon his knees before Terentia who lay upon her bed, and Æmilius stood near Aurelisa who sat leaning upon a Table. Whereupon Amiclea approaching to Aurelisa, without Terentia's observing it, Theanor was not at all interrupted. You see, Madam, (said he to her) an unhappy person who confesses his Crime. No, no, (answer'd Terentia with a Tone sufficiently herce) : do not go about to excuse your self ; you had reason to go, and succour a person by whom you are lov'd ; and to abandon one that does not love you. But as for Æmilius, if you had reason, he is a Criminal ; for he succour'd a person by whom he could never be lov'd, and deserted one that would have given her own life to save his. Æmilius hearing himself nam'd, drew near to her, and Aurelisa and Amiclea did the same, upon which there began so pathetical a conversation between these four persons, whose interests together were so hard to be disintangled, that scarce ever was the like seen. Theanor appear'd very much afflicted, Aurelisa extremely perplex'd, Æmilius absolutely inrag'd, to see himself no more lov'd than before his succouring Aurelisa ; and Terentia so incens'd both against Theanor and Æmilius that she could not endure the sight of them. Go, (said she to them) go, unjust persons as you are, and leave me at least the liberty to bemoan my self in quiet for my unhappiness, in being lov'd by a man of such gratitude, that rather than be ungrateful to another he suffer'd the person he lov'd to perish ; and for a second unhappiness in loving one so ungrateful, that he had rather save her life by whom he is hated, than hers from whom he has receiv'd a thousand courtesies. But, Madam, (repl'd Æmilius) if I am ungrateful towards you, are not you so towards Theanor, and is not Aurelisa the same towards me ? In truth (answer'd this fair Lady) I know not whether we be ungrateful, but I know well we are extremely unhappy. However it be (said Terentia) I have this advantage of my infelicity, that I owe nothing any longer to Theanor, and have so great cause not to love Æmilius more, that if indignation do not induce me to mistake, I am ready to hope I shall renounce my passion. As she ended these words, one came and inform'd Theanor and Æmilius that Aronces was returning to the Camp ; which summons constrain'd them to go away without time to speak four words, or hear one that pleas'd them. Aronces being more sensible of the misfortunes which are caus'd by love than of any others, when he was upon the way, did not cease to speak to Theanor and Æmilius ; he pitied and comforted them, and pittied himself too tho' without comfort, not having so much hope as to see a possibility of ever becoming happy. At his arrival at the Camp, he found a Council of War ready to be assembled, so that it behov'd him to make truce with Love, and bestow at least part of his mind upon the cares of the army and the siege. Now the Tuscans being a superstitious people, the accident of the broken Bridge, and the interpretations of the soothsayers upon it, gave occasion to several rumours among the Souldiers, some affirming that if Rome were attacked by force it would be taken ; others on the contrary maintaining, that if the course were attempted, it would not succeed. Nevertheless, the first opinion being more generally prevalent than the other, Porfenna and Tarquin conceiv'd this belief would probably excite the Souldiers to act with greater courage. Whereupon understanding by some Spies, that it was believ'd at Rome that they had no design to storm it by force, they took up a resolution to endeavour to surprize it. Tarquin being perfectly acquainted with the strength and weakness of the City, and instructed concerning the Fortifications made there since his absence, advis'd to make the principal onset on the side that

appear'd most inaccessible (tho indeed it was not so) because it would be the least guarded. That for this purpose it was requisite to seize upon Janiculum, and become Masters of the Sublician Bridge, which would afterwards be easily kept, because the Hill that was to be seiz'd on too would command it: That in the mean time no care ought to be omitted in order to such things as were necessary for the happy success of the Siege, in case this design should not take effect. Accordingly Porfenna sent order for the Boats which he had provided, to come away, not only with intent to stop up the Tiber with them both above and below Rome, but also to make two Bridges with them, which might be serviceable for the communication of the several Quarters of his Army. The resolution therefore of attacking the Hill Janiculus being taken, order was given for the Forces design'd for the attempt to be in readiness to march at the first break of Day; and for those who were to make false assaults in several contrary places to be ready also to execute what should be commanded them, and likewise for all the rest of the Army to be in arms. Aronces was the man to whom this bold enterprize was encharged, Titus was commanded to back him, Porfenna and Tarquin remaining in the Camp to give orders according to occasion, and Sextus was intrusted with the care of the false assaults. Nevertheless he was desirous to be in the most dangerous place of all; but Tarquin knowing how violently he was hated by the Romans, conceiv'd if they should know him during the fight, it would make them become the more valiant. This design having more need of Foot than Horse, because it behov'd them to seize on a Pass, the access to which was difficult. Aronces put himself on foot at the head of the Forces intended for it, and a Horse was led by, for him to make use of, when he shall see it convenient. There was this difficulty in the thing, that the attack could not be begun till it was day; because the Souldiers being to pass through rough and intricate places, would have molested one another; if they had gone in the dark without seeing their way. But not to lose time, Aronces march'd away in the head of his Forces as soon as the first appearance of day light. The Cavalry kept themselves on both sides of them, either to withstand such as might come out of Rome by the Sublician Bridge, where the Hill Janiculus was attacked, or to oppose such as might come from the Hill by any other side. Titus kept in readiness to back Aronces, if there were need of it; and Aronces prepar'd himself to shew the Friends he had in Rome, and the Enemies he had in the Camp, that he deserv'd all the glory he had acquir'd in so many several occasions as he was present in. Telanus, Æmylius, Theanor, Lacilius and Cesonius, brothers to the generous Melintha, and all the other brave persons of the Army fought near Aronces, whose mind was then very much employ'd; not onely with the care of coming off handsomely in this great enterprize, but also with the passion he had in his breast. For he was now beginning to draw his sword against Rome for whose interests he had gain'd a Battle, and he was going to see the house of Clelius, if his attempt succeeded; for it stood at the end of the City, on the side of the Hill Janiculus. He had indeed the consolation of apprehending, that neither Clelius nor Octavius would be in this attack, for the hill Janiculus was a kind of out-piece of the City, which in all likelihood a man of Clelius's age would not go to defend, nor was it probable Octavius's weakness occasion'd by his wounds would yet permit him to come into the field. He had likewise understood by a Spy, that Mutius was upon the guard of that place; and therefore knowing how couragious he was; and looking upon him as Rival to Herminius, and consequently no friend to himself, he went to this assault with a resolution to signalize himself highly in it. He fanci'd also some pleasure in thinking that after the taking of this Hill, he might be able to seize on the Bridge and the Gate, and that his valour might have the fair eyes of Clelia for Witnesses, it being sufficiently difficult for the last daring Ladies to refrain from beholding that, which nevertheless they would be willing not to see. Aronces therefore went to the fight with all the ardour of an Heroe, that would make it the interest of his Love to be courageous, to the end he might be more so. He caus'd his Forces to advance in so good order, that their march did not break them, tho they were necessitated to pass through a way sufficiently troublesome, and they came very near the Hill Janiculus before Mutius discover'd them; for they took a certain by way the which kept them from being taken notice of. Besides that a good thick mist being risen that morning which held for an hours space, it was not easie to discern them. 'Tis true, Mutius did not fail to send forth every night a party of Horse, to serve for a Guard to the Place he was Commander of; but Aronces took a way, by which he did not look to be assaulted. So that he was sufficiently surpris'd when he saw himself forc'd to prepare so suddenly to fight; but having an undaunted heart, he soon resolv'd upon it. However he sent forthwith to advertise Herminius, Who kept Guard at the Gate of the Bridge, to send him aid; and accordingly Horatius in the Head of the Principal Troops of the second Legion, went to assist Mutius to defend a hold of such importance. When he arriv'd, Aronces had already beaten back the Enemies to their first Trench; for when Porfenna's Troops advanc'd, Mutius came out in person against his Assaulters; upon which Aronces seeing an Enemy against him, which he could not overcome without Glory, encourag'd his Souldiers with his voice example, and went directly up to him, conceiving that if they could kill him, he might then easily carry the Pass which he guarded. The fight was very sharp, and very Bloody in this place; for the example of two such valiant men so animated both parties, that if it had been possible to resist Aronces long, Mutius had not yielded to him. But this Prince being this day more redoubtable than ever, there was no means to hold out against him. Every blow that he gave was mortal, all his Orders were executed as he could have wish'd, his example redoubled the Valour of his own Party, and weakened that of his enemies. Mutius himself was amaz'd at it, and soon constrain'd to abandon the first Trench, to the end he might better defend the second. But Horatius being arriv'd in the Head of the Troop which were sent to aid Mutius, Aronces, after having first forc'd the Trench, found the number of his Enemies redoubled, but as it is the custome of those who have great hearts, for their courage to encrease when the danger is so, Aronces being follow'd by all the brave Persons that accompani'd him, charg'd his Enemies with such vigour that they were astonish'd at it, and constrain'd to withdraw from the second entrenchment, as they had done from the first. Now altho Horatius ow'd his life to a Rival more than once, and in spite of his love was loath to be ingrateful to him, yet he did not cease to prepare himself to fight with him in this occasion, after having ralli'd and encourag'd his Forces; for the interest of Rome being contended for, and they in opposite Parties, he made no scruple of defending himself against him that attack'd him, how oblig'd soever he was to him. So he help'd Mutius to bear up against the violence of so redoubtable an Enemy; but tho his valour was not easily parallel'd in the World: yet that of Aronces was greater than his; for without looking whether he were follow'd or no, he still charg'd forward, and suffer'd none to stand against him. Mutius himself was wounded by Aronces, and carry'd out of the fight, tho it was not mortally. So that Horatius perceiving it would be impossible to hinder Aronces from making himself Master of the Place, judg'd it more requisite to think of going to defend the Bridge, than to persist in the unprofitable maintaining of a Post which he could not keep. Nevertheless he made a great shock to beat back the Enemies: but Aronces coming up to him, brandishing his sword, This is the day, Horatius, (said he to him) that we may end all our differences, and perhaps, our misfortunes. Since 'tis lawful for me (answer'd Horatius fiercely) to fight against all Enemies of Rome whatsoever, I am willing that we determine all our quarrels with our swords. In speaking of this, these two valiant Men began to fight, which in all probability had not ended but in the death of both, if Publicola, who was advertis'd of the state of the matter had not sent order to withdraw the Forces from the Hill Janiculus, and to take care only for the defence of the Bridge. 'Tis true this order was in a manner unprofitable; for the valour of Aronces and those who follow'd him, had already driven the Enemies to that choice. Wherefore Horatius observing the disorder of his Forces, bethought himself of retiring. Which yet he was much put to't to do. For Aronces having pass'd upon him, seiz'd upon his Sword, and took it from him: but Horatius being strong, disengag'd himself from his Enemy, and drawing back towards his Souldiers to get a Sword, they enclos'd him, and shrouding him from the sight of his Rival, constrain'd him to obey the Orders of Publicola. Aronces all fierce with his victory, sought for his enemy, whom he had overcome; but not finding him, he sacrific'd to his revenge, all such as dar'd to resist him, and made himself absolute Master of the Hill Janiculus. After which conceiving it requisite to make sure of the place he had gain'd, he staid there to give necessary orders for the guarding of it, and causing fresh Forces to come to seize upon the Bridge, whilst Telanus in the head of a part of the victorious Troops pursued those that retreated, with intention to begin the assault of the Bridge, and so to become Master of the Gate which Herminius guarded. But the Tuscans found this design was not so easie to execute as they had believ'd; for Horatius, being provided of another sword, stay'd at the end of the Bridge, and bore up against all the impetuosity of the Enemies. Aronces indeed was not there, but he had so many Enemies on all sides, that any other but he would never have dar'd to think of resisting. In the mean time there was a strange confusion in Rome: the affrighted People believ'd the Enemies were coming in upon them on all sides, the Women went to the Temples to supplicate to the Gods, the Old Men encourag'd their Children to the defence of their Country, all such as bore Arms, went whither the Consuls commanded them to go: and Publicola without being terrifi'd gave such orders as was necessary for the conservation of Rome. During this great Tumult, Clelia was at a window of her Closet with Valeria and Colatina, who were then at her house, and who suffer'd more than can be imagin'd; for they might probably undergo considerable losses in both parties. It was known by wounded Mutius, that Aronces was in person at the Hill Janiculus, and that the Prince Titus was there too; for his Troops advanc'd for the winning the second Trench, and Valeria seeing her dear Herminius at the guard of the Gate which was expos'd to the Enemies, thought her self every moment in danger of losing all the lov'd, as well as Clelia and Colatina. They having a true love to their Country in their hearts, pray'd the gods for the preservation of Rome: but at the same time they pray'd for those that assaulted it, and made as ardent vows for Aronces and Titus, as for the liberty of their native City. No question but they judg'd it a dreadful spectacle, to see all the Mountain which lay at the end of the Sublician Bridge cover'd with Souldiers, who throng'd down it to back those who attack'd the Bridge, and to see the Roman Souldiers at the same time daunted with the approach of that multitude of arm'd Men, who came upon them, as to an assur'd victory, and retiring in Confusion, and entring tumultuously into the City, for all the resistance of Herminius, who endeavour'd to hinder them from it, and could not so much as cause the Gate to be shut. So that Horatius saw himself left alone, to bear up against the whole power of the Enemies. 'Tis true, Herminius and Spurius soon joyn'd themselves to him, and these three Lovers did prodigious things in the fight of their Mistresses. Whether flie you, Cowards as you are, (said Horatius to the Souldiers that forsook him) do not you see, that if you abandon the defence of the Bridge, there will presently be as many Enemies, in the Palatine Hill, and the Capitol, as in the Hill Janiculus? At least (added he) if you will not fight, break the bridge, and leave me alone to bear the shock of those Enemies, who are not terrible but because you fear them. At these words the affrighted Souldiers chose rather to break the Bridge than to fight; and accordingly they began to break down the Bridge with all the dilligence of people possess'd with fear, whilst Horatius accompani'd onely with Herminius and Spurius, sustain'd the whole power of the Enemies, without other arms than their bucklers and swords. 'Tis true he appear'd with such a boldness, that the fierceness wherewith he repell'd those that assaulted him, struck terrour into them, and sometimes forced them to recoil. Herminius and Spurius seconded him likewise with very great valour; but at length the Bridge being almost broken, and nothing left but a small Plank to pass from one side to the other, he told Herminius and Spurius, it was time for them to retire; and accordingly these two gallant persons imagining he intended to pass over the plank as well as themselves, retir'd. But Horatius led by an Heroical ardour, fiercely commanded commanded the Romans to break down that Plank, and staid alone for defence of the Bridge, sometimes defying the *Tuscan*s, and sometimes reproaching them for their injustice in protecting a Tyrant; and sometimes threatening them as fiercely, as if it had been in his power to overcome them, tho he stood alone against a whole Army. This extraordinary action so amaz'd the Enemies, that for a small while they suspended the violence of their valour, not knowing almost what they were to do. But at length seeing Horatius going from side to side with his sword in his hand, to the end he might take up all the Bridge, they were so struck with shame, and enrag'd, that in an instant a storm of Arrows falling upon him, his Shield was broken all to pieces. At which moment Herminius and Spurius perceiving Horatius had not pass'd back upon the plank, offer'd to return to him; but they could not, because they, who were set to break it, having done it according to Horatius's orders, and that part of the Bridge being fallen into the Water with a great noise, all the Romans sent forth such loud cries of joy, that the Enemies withheld their fury for an instant, whilst Horatius observing Rome was in safety, lifted up his eyes to Heaven and cry'd, O god of Tyber, receive favourably into thy bosom, a man who has never been willing to live or die but for his Country: In saying which he leapt into the water, and turning his face towards the windows of Clelia, which lookt out on that side, he began to swim, without forsaking his sword or his shield so shatter'd with the Enemies arrows. But tho this spectacle deserv'd only admiration, yet the Tuscan Soldiers looking upon Horatius, as a man, who alone had hindred them from taking Rome, began to shoot upon him such a great multitude of Arrows, that he could not have fail'd to perish, if the valiant Aronces, after having assur'd the Post which he had gain'd, had not arriv'd on Horseback upon the bank of Tyber. Where being inform'd of what had pass'd, and being not able to hinder himself from admiring his Rival, the same Prince who an hour before endeavour'd to kill him, could not suffer that so valiant a Man as he should perish after so strange a manner. Yet he wisht he could have fought with him, and advanc'd towards the River for the purpose; but Horatius was already so near the other side of the Tyber, that he could not come at him. Wherefore not being able to overcome him gloriously, he would not that he should perish in his presence, after having done so glorious an action; and, out of unparallel'd generosity, forbad his Souldiers to shoot upon Horatius. Ah Cowards (said he to them) you ought to have overcome him with your swords, and forc'd the Bridge which he defended, and not cover him with Arrows when he can no longer defend himself. These words having stoppt that clouds of Arrows which darken'd the Air, both parties beheld Horatius safely arrive at the other side of the River, and Aronces had the grief to imagine, that Clelia saw with her own eyes the great action of his Rival, and that she beheld at that instant the great honours the Romans were doing him. However there being nothing more to be done, Aronces was enforc'd to be contented with having gain'd a very advantageous place, which would extreamly inconvenience Rome, and prevented their making of Sallies, which might have much molested the Camp of the Besiegers. But tho this dayes actions were very glorious to him, in as much as he had wounded Mutius, disarm'd Horatius, and taken the Hill Janiculus, yet he was excellently afflicted. Not that he was capable of envy; but the Passion of Love in his breast, caus'd him to apprehend distasteful consequences of his Rival's glory. Accordingly the next morning he understood by a Spy, that the like honour had never been done to any other Roman since the foundation of Rome; that the Senate had decreed a Statue should be erected to Horatius at the end of the Bridge which he had defended, that Clelius was the Man that propos'd the rendring the publick testimony of gratitude to his valour, and that at the dissolving of the Senate, the same Clelius had carried Horatius to Sulspitia and Clelia. Dispatch, Fortune, dispatch, (said Aronces in himself, as soon as he had opportunity to be alone) render me the most unhappy of all men, by wholly depriving me of hope and possibility of ever to become happy. For what ground is there to retain the least hope after that which is arriv'd? Clelia hath seen my Rival with her own eyes, doing the greatest action that ever was, and perhaps too she believes I was among those he fought with at the end of the Bridge, and puts me in the number of those that could not overcome him. But, alas! tho this should not be so, yet Clelius will make use of Horatius's valour against me: for what can be refus'd to him, that has preserv'd Rome? Therefore I must resolve to see Clelia unfaithful, or Clelia persecuted; and consequently I must prepare my self to be always miserable.

CLELIA.

A New Romance.

The First BOOK.

WHILE Aronces was possess'd with an opinion that his present condition rendred him the most unhappy Man in the World, Horatius sometimes enjoy'd all the delectation that glory together with hope is, capable to excite in a heart truly amorous. He tasted the joy of being satisfi'd with himself; which is the highest pleasure possible for a rational person to resent: He had perform'd a piece of singular service to his Country; and altho Aronces had disarm'd him, yet his last action afforded him satisfaction for that misfortune. Besides Clelius being so favourable to him, he had reason to conceive that the end of the War would prove the beginning of his felicity. And indeed he perceiv'd so unanimous a Resolution in the Roman Citizens to defend themselves to the utmost, that he would not so much as entertain in his thoughts a possibility for Porfenna to become Master of Rome. What place soever he went into, afford'd him new cause of contentment, saving when he repair'd to Clelia, whom he alwaies found affected with the same aversion towards him. When he pass'd along the streets, the people attested his glory with a thousand acclamations; when he went to the Temple, he beheld Sacrifices offer'd there in thankfulness to the gods for the great action which he had perform'd; when he went to the Senate, he understood they had ordain'd a Statue to be erected to him as an eternal Monument of his valour: to conclude, only the fair eyes of Clelia depriv'd him of the hope, which fortune every where else suggested to him. And truly this was oftentimes sufficient to disturb all the pleasure, that hope could give him. The next morning after that great exploit, which had rendr'd him so eminent in Rome, Clelius bringing him to his house, and presenting him to his Daughter, he found cause to believe that what he had done had no influence to change the heart of that fair Lady. At first Clelius having beheld her with a sufficiently cold air, was immediately, out of an excessive affection for his Country transported against her. How? (said he to her with a low but angry Tone) dare you appear sad, when I bring the Deliverer of Rome to you? and have you the boldness to discover in your eyes the tokens of that obstinate and unjust passion which you harbour in your mind? Clelia hearing her Father speak in this manner, blusht and cast down her eyes;

so that Horatius not doubting, but that which Clelius spoke low to her, displeas'd her, was almost sorry for it, tho he apprehended the discourse could not but be in his favour. Wherefore advancing towards her, he interrupting the private communication, Permitt me to ask you, Madam (said he, perceiving Clelius retire) whether the general fright yesterday did not reach you too; and whether you had the resolution to behold from your windows, that multitude of enemies which would have surpriz'd the City, had not the bridge been broken down, at which they endeavour'd to enter. You speak very modestly of one of the fairest actions of the world (answer'd she) but to shew you that I am never unjust (added this prudent Lady) know, that tho you seem'd appointed by Destiny for the cause of the greatest infelicities of my life, nevertheless I did not cease to make vows in your behalf, when I saw you alone in the middle of the Bridge, sustaining the whole power of the Enemies. For indeed I saw all that pass'd in that great occasion; and I likewise beheld Aronces forbid his men to shoot at you, when you were in the River Tyber. I should myself have inform'd you, Madam, (repli'd Horatius) of that generosity of my Rival, tho you had not seen it; for I have heretofore often told you, that I yield to his merit and his vertue; 'tis only in point of Love that I contend with him for superiority. And to testify to you at least, Madam, that I do all that I can, know, I did not interrupt Clelius, but only because I apprehended he spoke sharply to you in my favour. I acknowledge it (answer'd Clelia) and I shall also acknowledge that you deserve my esteem and my friendship. Nevertheless, observing hope this day become more prevalent in your heart, I shall tell you once more (generous Horatius) that it will be best for you not to flatter your self into an error by it; since the more Aronces becomes unhappy, the more shall I be oblig'd to be faithful to him; and the more my Father persecutes me, the more resolvedness shall I have to withstand him. For in brief he has once given me to Aronces, and I have joyn'd in the gift; so that 'tis in the power of death alone to hinder me from being his. Moreover wete he no longer mine, I have told you an hundred times, I should never be yours nor any others. Content your self with being belov'd by the whole People of Rome; enjoy quietly the glory you have acquir'd; and do not render your self miserable, for a person, that can never make you happy. Other virilants hereupon arriving, Horatius was constrain'd to withdraw, his heart being so full, that he could not but manifest part of his grief. And therefore he made a low reverence, without being able to speak any thing to Clelia, saving by some glances not less sad than amorous. As he came from thence he found Æmilius, who being unhappy as well as he, seem'd a fit person to be the confident of his sorrow. Walking along together, and Æmilius observing him very sad, What's the cause (said he to him) that you seem so melancholy in a day wherein you ought to know no other passion but joy? Alas Æmilius (cry'd Horatius) 'tis in vain that I have repell'd the enemies, since Aronces is not so absolutely Master of the Janiculum, which he hath seiz'd, as he is alwayes of the heart of Clelia; and should Fortune cause me to perform miracles for the safety of Rome, I should not thereby be less unhappy. In which regard, I can assure you Aronces is not at present so miserable as I; undoubtedly no unhappiness being so unsupportable as that whereby we find, that what ought to produce our felicity causes our misfortune. However (reply'd Æmilius) your misery is not so extraordinary as mine: Clelia lov'd Aronces before she knew you; she has lov'd him ever since, and you have not been able to win her affection. But as for me, unfortunate as I am, I have seen the cruel Valeria not to hate me, during the time she believ'd Herminius was unfaithful and dead: but since she understood his being alive and innocent, she has ceas'd to love me, and depriv'd me of all hope for ever. Ah! Æmilius (answer'd Horatius) that which you say causes your regret, is the very thing that ought to afford you consolation; For according to the transports of Love in which I am at present, I think if Clelia had lov'd me but only one day in all my life, the remembrance alone of so great a pleasure would suffice to keep me from being miserable the remainder of my days. But when I consider that my Rival is belov'd, that according to all probabilities he will be ever so, that I have never been so, for so much as one moment, and that perhaps I never shall be during my life; patience forsakes me, despair seizes me, and I wish for death every instant. Had I the same sentiments as heretofore (contin'd Horatius) when I carry'd away Clelia, I could easily induce Clelia to constrain her to marry me. After what I have perform'd, the people would approve the violence, and the Senate in the present posture of affairs would not offer to oppose my happiness: but (Æmilius) I know to my misery, that unless Clelia bestow her self, I cannot wish to possess her; since 'tis the heart of that cruel person which can cause my felicity. But (alas) that (to my misfortune) is in the power of a Rival whom I admire in spite of my self, for whom I bear as much esteem as hatred, to whom I am so highly oblig'd, that I cannot injure him without ingratitude, and who sets me such great examples of generosity, that it's necessary to be a Heroe to surpass him. Cease therefore to bemoan your self, or at the best think me the greatest object of commiseration. Yet on the other side generous Horatius (reply'd Æmilius) did you know what it is to have been lov'd and to be so no longer, you would change the thoughts; for no favourable glance has been formerly obtain'd, but then causes a thousand regrets; not an advantageous word heard, but occasions a thousand torments; and the opposition of misery to happiness, produces such a strange hurly-burly in an amorous breast, that the insensibility of a Mistress is an affliction not comparable to what I speak of. Did I love a person insensible in reference to all love (answer'd Horatius) you would have reason: but I love a person that has a soft heart, that is able to love both with order and constancy, and consequently to resist whatever opposes the affection she has in her soul. When I spoke of an insensible Person (reply'd Æmilius) I meant in respect to you alone; for, as I said before, 'tis a more exquisite misery to be belov'd no more, than to have never been lov'd at all. I conceive indeed (said Horatius) it would be a greater affliction to fall into poverty after having been rich, than to have been alwayes poor; but 'tis not so in love: for in my apprehension, the thought of never having been lov'd, not being so at present, and despairing ever to be so, is the most cruel and insupportable of all those that can be inspir'd by an infortunate passion. Æmilius answer'd Horatius again, and Horatius yielded not to Æmilius; so that they parted without having convinc'd one another. But while these two Lovers bemoaned themselves together, there were others also who did the like. All Plotina's Lovers, looking upon Amilcar, as he that of all the rest injur'd them most, scarce hated one another at all, but hated him excessively, tho they dar'd not to express it. Themistus being always absent, and alwayes discontented, lamented himself amongst his Friends. Artemidorus being alwayes lov'd by two very aimable persons, had not a little to do. Spurius was displeas'd with himself that he had not been able to out-do Herminius, who signaliz'd himself most, next Horatius. And Mutius being as ambitious as amorous, was desperately afflicted for that he had not been able to defend the Janiculum, and had been wounded: for altho the wound he receiv'd was not dangerous, yet it confin'd him to his Chamber; where abandoning himself to regret, he revolv'd in his thoughts what ever most difficult attempts a great Spirit incens'd both against Love and Fortune could devise to overcome his misfortune. But having a Soul too noble to seek ways that were not honourable, he fanci'd nothing but what was grand and heroical. Herminius is belov'd (said he within himself) and deserves to be so; Æmilius is an amiable Person, and was not hated whilst Valeria believ'd Herminius had betray'd her and was dead; and Spurius is subtle, daring, dextrous and amorous. What then shall I do (contin'd he) to overcome such formidable Rivals? I must do some action transcending that of Horatius (added this afflicted Lover) and signalize my self so remarkably, that my Rivals may not afterwards dare to stand in competition with me for Valeria. I must save Rome with one stroke, if it be possible; and indeed it is too shameful to see it Captive when it boasts to be free, and to see it more miserable when it has no Tyrants, than when it was under the Tyranny of the Tarquins. After which Mutius having thought upon what he would undertake, took no care to be cur'd speedily, to the end he might execute the great design he had determin'd of in his mind. In the mean time Aronces maintaining his Conquest, and taking care to cause the Janiculum to be more fortifi'd on the side towards Rome, suffer'd more misery than can be imagin'd: for he well perceiv'd, that since this famous City could not be surpris'd at first, it would be very difficult to become Master of it by force, unless it were in a time so long, that Horatius would perhaps have leisure to work some change on the sentiments

ments of Clelia: not that he could believe her capable of infidelity; but tho he could not believe it, yet he could fear it; and the glory of Horatius, the authority of Clelius, the people's affection towards his Rival, the little probability there was that Porfenna would consent to his marriage, all these circumstances consider'd, together with his own absence, added weight to his fear, and diminish'd his hope. Nevertheless he trusted to the fidelity of his Illustrious Friends at Rome, and sometimes imagin'd secret consolations to himself, which enabled him to support all his misfortunes. Moreover, a sentiment of glory adding it self to that of love, the care of the Siege almost wholly employ'd his mind. But that which rendered him more unhappy, was, that he was constrain'd to see Tarquin and Sextus. He knew that the first always lov'd Clelia; and looking upon Sextus as one that had lov'd her, that might still love her, and that had caus'd the death of Lucretia, he hated and disdain'd him, tho he was not ignorant, that as voluptuous and unjust a Prince as he was, he had some qualities in him not unpleasing to such as did not know him. Aronces likewise understood by a spy, that the Senate in testimony of greater acknowledgement to Horatius, had bestow'd on him as great a compass of Lands as two Oxen could in one day enclose with a furrow; that all the Inhabitants of Rome had particularly made him a present of something or other, to the end he might not suffer any inconvenience during the Siege; and that Horatius making a generous use of the same, had not only given to the poor all that they had offer'd to him, but moreover all that he had received from the rich. By which means the good fortune and the virtue of Horatius being alike terrible to him, this Prince was extremely miserable, and found no comfort, saving when he was free to go and entertain the Princess of the Leontines, a few moments, with discourse of his infelicities. Which notwithstanding he could not do often at the beginning of the Siege, by reason his presence was necessary in so many places, that he had scarce time to go see the Queen of Clusina. In the mean time it being resolv'd at a Council of War not to make more attempts to take Rome by force, order was taken to furnish it. To which purpose Porfenna caus'd little Forts to be rais'd at equal distances about the City, and the Tyber to be secur'd both above and below Rome, with Boats fastned together with chains; all these Boats being defended by Towers which were rais'd to that end on each side of the River; besides that there were also guards of Souldiers placed in several stations, which were reliev'd from time to time. These Boats serving at that time for a Bridge to Porfenna's Army, the Tarquinius pass'd over from the other side of Tyber, and extended their Camp into the Plain, after having pitcht upon a very advantageous place, where they might easily hinder any thing from being carried into Rome on that side, and from whence they sent parties out to waste, to make spoil in all the adjacent parts about that City. Rome was by this means begirt on all sides; but the more it was straitned, the Romans became the more courageous. Herminius being desirous to signalize himself, and accounting it a disparagement to be coop'd up, undertook to fetch provision into the City. Not that he believ'd that what he could procure brought in, would be capable to make it subsist any long time; but being a person of great prudence, he understood it was requisite to amuse the people, And he had occasion to take this course with them; for as soon as all the avenues and passages of Rome were secur'd by the Enemy, the common sort began to have an extreme dread of Famine. But altho this fear seem'd but to encrease their hatred against Tarquin, yet there was cause to suspect it might at length administer occasion to a sedition; it being natural enough to the poor to murmur against the rich, and likewise sufficiently ordinary for the rich to have no great pity of the poor. Herminius therefore minding to prevent so great a mischief, told Valerius, it was requisite to send to the neighbouring people, to the end to obtain of them such things as they had most need of; and that, for his part, he would engage to secure the entrance of Convoys into Rome. Whereupon some persons were sent out by night, to go to the people of Latium, and to oblige them to succour the City; and others also to Cuma of Campania, and to Pometia: but the Latins refus'd to take any side between Rome and the Tarquinius, and they of Cuma answered ambiguously; only the people of Pometia promis'd provisions, conditionally they might be oblig'd to nothing more than to furnish the Waggons which were to carry them. Wherefore Herminius to acquit himself of his word, one night when the Moon did not shine, issu'd forth of the City with some Troops, and taking a by-way, which the Besiegers had not took care to secure, happily executed his design, and brought a competent supply of mouth-munition into Rome. The Enemies indeed being aware of it, there was a very sharp conflict between them and the Troops that guarded the Convoy; but the valour of Herminius held them off, till all the Waggons were enter'd into the City, without so much as the miscarriage of one; and this Illustrious Roman having born the stroke of the Enemies as long time as was requisite for the executing of his purpose, re-entred into Rome, about the break of day, in the sight of all the people, who beheld him as a second Protector, next Horatius. Moreover, to the end this might have the greater effect upon the minds of the multitude, all these Waggons were made to pass through the principal streets, before they went to the publick Store-houses. By which means they murmur'd less for some dayes than they had done formerly. But for that they were at that time above 30000 persons in the City, this supply was quickly spent; and the dearness of provision encreasing from day to day, the repinings of the Commonalty began also afresh. It was in vain that Valerius, Clelius, Horatius, Herminius and the rest endeavour'd to appease the People; for the fear of Famine, and the present suffering render'd them so perverse that whatever was resolv'd upon, incens'd them. When sallies were made, it was said they were intended only to occasion the slaughter of men, and that there might be a less number to feed; if none were attempted, it was publish'd about as cowardize to suffer themselves to be shut up by so few Besiegers: If the Publick Stores were set open, they rumor'd that all the Provisions would soon be consum'd and that only the creatures of Tarquin gave this counsel, which was far more dangerous than it seem'd: If there were any speech of shutting the same up, and preserving the Publick Provisions against extremity, presently it was threaten'd to set fire on the Stores: In brief, nothing could be more difficult than to find out some fit means to compose the discontents of the City. Porfenna and Tarquin having intelligence of this disorder, sent Heralds to demand to speak to the people. Then it was that all the intelligent persons in Rome stood in fear; for they conceiv'd it was to make some Proposition of Peace, with intention to cause the people to mutiny, if it were not receiv'd. Wherefore the Senate was minded to send back the Heralds unheard. But the multitude was so tumultuous, that it was necessary to hear them; all that could be obtain'd from the provoked people, was, that those Heralds should not enter into the City, but make their Propositions at the Gate. To which being accordingly oblig'd, they declar'd there aloud, that Porfenna sent to acquaint the Romans, that if they desir'd to be deliver'd from the War and Famine, and to avoid inevitable destruction, it was yet possible, and they needcd onely to admit Tarquin, to secure their Peace; Porfenna engaging to cause him to pass an Amnclty for all that was past, and to protect them also against him in case he falsifi'd his word. The Consuls trembled at this Proposal, fearing lest the present misery might induce the people to prefer a shameful Peace before a glorious War: but the matter had a better event than they imagin'd. The name of Tarquin was so odious to the People, that what Porfenna caus'd to be declar'd to them, to the intent to cause the sedition, produc'd a calm; for scarce had the Heralds done their Message, but the multitude who had beset all the Ramparts, relating to one another confusedly the Proposition that Porfenna made to them, cri'd all with one voice, No, no 'tis better to die, and we will rather set our City on fire, than receive Tarquin into it: and their fury transported them in such sort, that they had shot their Arrows against the Heralds, and violated the Law of Nations, if the Consuls had not restrain'd them. So these Messengers of Porfenna were enforced to depart; and the people, after this, seeing nothing to be chosen but War or the Tyranny of Tarquin, generously resolv'd upon suffering, and endur'd all the inconveniences of this Siege with admirable patience. Soon after, a private Council of War was held in order to attempt to break those two Bridges of Boats which secur'd the River, since had it been free on one side onely, Porfenna's design had been destroy'd, and this Prince would have found a necessity of giving over the Siege. It had been sufficiently experienc'd that sallies serv'd only to weaken the Cavalry which was in the City; for there being no other Forces in the Compagned design'd to relieve it, all sallies were unprofitable, and did not sufficiently facilitate the passage of Victuals for the subsistence of it. So that the only way to deliver it, was to render their River free. To which end it was resolv'd an attempt should be made, and that above Rome rather than below, since by that means it would be commodious for the Vessels to come down with the stream, for carrying necessaries into the City; whereas on the other side it would be requisite to row up against it. The on-set indeed was very difficult, but the designing to put good Rowers into all the Boats appointed for the attack, made that no obstacle. Themistius, tho a stranger, was called to this secret Council, and propounded to set the Enemies Boats on fire, in case they could not be forc'd; and accordingly preparation was made for this. In order to which, two Boats were fill'd with several kinds of combustible things as Pitch, Sulphur, Bitumen, and divers Gummes; and a hundred others were chosen out and fill'd with resolute Souldiers. Every Boat had a particular Commander in it; and besides the Souldiers, and the Rowers, there were also men with

Axes to break and loosen the Chains which fastned the Boats to one another. This enterprize being accompanied with much danger and difficulty, all the Gallants were eager to be in it. Mutius, who was almost cured of his wound, desir'd the command of a Boat; Themistius, Herminius, Emilius and Spiritus did the like: Artemidorus and Marigenes were in the same Boat, Amilcar was in that of Herminius, Zenocrates commanded one by himself, in which Octavius was pleas'd to be; Horatius had the conduct of one of the Fire-boats, which was fastned to his own, and Herminius had charge of the other, altho Mutius had us'd all possible endeavours to get that employment. Damon, Sicinius, Acrisius, and divers other Gallants, were dispers'd in all the Boats. In the mean time, tho all care had been taken to keep this enterprize secret, yet the Enemies got intelligence of it, and prepar'd themselves to be assaulted. But for that they could not learn whether they should be attacked above or below Rome, they were necessitated to divide their Forces; and moreover, the better to deceive them, a false attack was thought fit to be given on that side which was not intended for the place of on-set. The Tuscans and Tarquinius had rais'd little Forts at both ends of that Bridge of Boats, which stoppt up the River, and serv'd for the communication of the distant quarters of their Army: & this no doubt augmented the difficulty of the Romans attempt. But how hard soever it was, it was resolv'd upon; and all things being ready for it, precisely at midnight, all the Boats appointed for both purposes put forth upon the River. But those which were to make the false attack, set out first, to the end to divert the enemies Forces to that side; and a quarter of an hour after, the others moving in order, and taking up almost the whole breadth of the River, in several ranks went to encounter the Enemies with so much greater hope of Victory, for that they knew Aronces was not on that side, pretending to make use of their Fire-boats according to the occasion they should have for them. But, for that it is alwaies a little lighter in the night-time upon the water than upon the land, the Tuscans confusedly perceiv'd those that were coming to attack them, and provided for their defence. So that the Bridge of Boats, and two little Forts defending it, were soon beset with Souldiers, and especially with Bow-men, who seeing the Romans within reach of their Arrows, shot with such eagerness, that the multitude of Arrows made a greater darkness thereabouts than that of the night. But because they shot at a venture, this first discharge had no great effect, and hinder'd not the Romans from approaching the Bridge with cries so fierce, that they seem'd to be a presage of Victory. All the Boats as they drew near to those which upheld the Tarquinius Bridge, hooked themselves thereunto, and they planted little Ladders against them for the Souldiers to mount upon the Bridge, whilst the work-men did what they could with their Axes to break the Chains that linked the Enemies Boats together. On the other side, Horatius and Herminius, who were the chief Fire-boats in this enterprize, went to fasten the Enemies opposition; and having left a hidden fire in the two Boats, which would break out suddenly after they retir'd, one went towards the right hand, and the other towards the left, to encourage their men to make themselves Masters of the Bridge, and to endeavour to mount upon it themselves, which

which was no easie matter; for the Enemies who stood thick upon it with their swords in their hands, repell'd them impetuously either into their Boats or the River. Mutius, Artemidorus and Merigenes mounted twice upon the Bridge, and were as often beat back into their Boat. Acrisius laying hold of a plank of the Bridge, and being almost got up, was wounded in the right hand: Zenocrates also mounted upon it courageously; but for that they which follow'd him were cast into the River, he found himself alone amidst many enemies, who seizing upon him, threw him into the River also on the other side the Bridge, after he had wounded one or two of them. Nevertheless losing neither his courage nor his judgement, he swam back under the Enemies Bridge with his sword in his hand, and got into one of the Boats again, to return to the assault. Amilcar being got up the Bridge, and perceiving himself the sole man of his party there, counterfeited a Tuscan, and had the good fortune to leap back into Herminius's Boat without being taken by the Enemies. Horatius was four times repuls'd; Spirius had like to have been drown'd, and so had Emilius; but Herminius was so fortunate, that he caus'd one of the Enemies Boats to be loosned, at the same time that the Fire-boats doing their effect immediately burnt down the middle of the Bridge, which consisting only of planks and faggots was soon consumed. Then was there heard a most terrible noise, for the Romans sent forth a thousand cries of joy, and the Tuscans contrarily a thousand tumultuous shouts, which testified their astonishment; for the fire having taken away the middle of the Bridge, depriv'd them of communication from one side to the other, and opened a passage for a great Convoy which they understood was prepared in Boats under the walls of a little very strong Town, where the Romans knew the supply was which they expected. And things were accordingly so happily executed, that the Convoy was already very near, when the middle of the Bridge was burnt. Wherefore so soon as the fire mingled with Sulphur and Bitumen began to destroy the middle of the Bridge, Horatius & Herminius easily caus'd as many Boats to be loosned as was requisite for the passage of those which carried the Provision: for such as were appointed to that purpose, with great hooks dispers'd those burnt Boats, which separated one from another, and being driven by the stream towards Rome, consum'd by degrees, and cover'd all the River with flaming wracks not without some terrour in the spectacle. In the mean time, as soon as the passage was open'd by the flame, the attacke of the Bridge was given over, there being no likelihood of doing any good upon the two Forts, and the only business being to procure a safe entry for the Convoy. Wherefore as soon as the River was free, at the first signal that was given of it, all the Boats drew together, and one half of them following Herminius went to meet the Convoy, and the other commanded by Horatius stay'd to guard the passage. At which time the Enemies discharg'd a storm of Darts both upon those that stay'd to guard it, and upon those that conducted the Convoy. Which while they were approaching some Gallants amongst the Enemies got into the Boats which remain'd at the two ends of the Bridge at the foot of the little Forts, and came forth to chase away the Romans from the place. And indeed they being assisted by those of their party, who still stood with their swords drawn upon both the ends of the broken Bridge, where they had at length stop't the course of the fire, Horatius being unable to master those that guided the Boats, was in a short time constrain'd to desert the passage of the River to the Enemies. So that when Herminius came back with the Convoy, he found that he was to fight again if he intended to pass. It was about day-break, and precisely at that time the Prince of Messene coming to second Titus who commanded the Souldiers in the Boats, appear'd with his sword in his hand upon the end of the Bridge. But when he perceiv'd Themistus in one of Horatius's Boats, he leap'd into one of those that maintain'd the passage, desiring to take this opportunity to encounter his particular enemy amongst the enemies of the side he had chosen. Themistus also knowing him, caus'd his Boat to advance neerer than it was, and with a threatening action signifi'd to him that he was glad to see him in a place where he might evince that himself was more worthy of Lindamira than he. Matters standing thus, Herminius appear'd in the head of the Conduct of the Convoy; for Horatius was constrain'd by the advice of all the chief Officers to defer charging those that defended the passage, till they might be attack'd on both sides together. And accordingly Horatius and Herminius advancing at the same time, and being follow'd by as many Boats as were necessary to possess the passage, went to charge them with their swords in hand. Whereupon ensued a very terrible combat; for from the Forts and the two sides of the broken Bridge, a storm of Arrows like hail was sent both upon Herminius and Horatius. But without taking unprofitable care to secure themselves from a danger which they could not avoid, but by deserting their intercept, they minded only the overcoming those who obstructed them. Horatius leapt into a Boat which Telanus defended, Herminius into another; Themistus and the Prince of Messene having the same purpose, executed it so exactly, that at the same time that Themistus leapt with his sword drawn into the Prince's Boat, the Prince pass'd into that of Themistus. But perceiving their error, they endeavour'd either of them to return into his own Boat; which as they were doing, they grappled together, and fell both into the water. As they fell, they were parted by their own weight; and being both skilful in swimming, as soon as they got their heads above water, they approacht to one another and exchanged some blows; and this strange combat would probably have prov'd fatal to both, had not a Roman Boat drew towards these two Rivals. Which as soon as the Prince of Messene saw, he endeavour'd to avoid being taken, and began to swim towards one of the Forts; but finding that he had received a slight wound in the right hand, his sword dropt from him. Wherefore Themistus seeing him without arms, and streaming with blood, would not kill him in that condition; but entering into the Boat which came to his succour, suffer'd him to get the bank of the River, where he was receiv'd by those of his party. In the mean time Horatius and Herminius being seconded by all the other Gallants, maugre the resistance of the Tarquians, sunk two Boats, slew almost all that were in the rest, and became at length so absolute Masters of the passage, that they got the Convoy clear through it. They had a mind to have maintain'd it afterwards, but it was not to be done, for the Enemies possessing the Forts still, and the two ends of the Bridge, would not have suffer'd them in the place. So that it behov'd them to content themselves with carrying their Convoy to Rome, which was likewise more considerable in respect of the joy and hope it excited cited in the people, than of the real succour it brought to the Publick necessity: for in these occasions, the multitude alwaies magnifies things, and do's not carry their fore-sight so far as to destroy the pleasure arising from a present relief. This victorious Fleet therefore return'd to Rome, which was received there with a thousand acclamations. It had cost the life of some few Souldiers, and their were also certain persons of quality wounded. Spurius was shot with an Arrow that rais'd his shoulder, Damon was wounded with a sword in the side, Horatius receiv'd a slight hurt under the right eye, and Meleagenes on the arm. But however, this Victory did not prove a bloody one, and the action was accompani'd with great glory. The better to set it off to the people, thanks were render'd to the gods in all the Temples, the price of Victual was abated, part of these Provisions brought into the City were distributed to the people, and they were put in hope that other Convoys would also shortly come by land. As for those that had made the false attaque, Fortune was not so favourable to them as to the others, and they were inforc'd to fight more than they intended; for Aronces hapning to be on that side, because it was believ'd it would be the most dangerous, came forth to meet them with armed Boats, and repell'd them so vigorously, that they were constrain'd to return towards Rome. He also took two of their Vessels: but understanding the real attaque would not be on that side, a sentiment of glory made him regret his absence from the place of greatest danger. Nevertheless soon after, a sentiment of Love made him the less sorry, inasmuch as he could not be accused by Clelia for being instrumental by his valour to encrease a necessity, in which perhaps she might be concern'd, by hindring Provisions from entering into Rome. But being desirous to send her some tidings of himself, and not being able to go where the conflict was, since Rome stood between him and the place, he writ a short Letter in his Tablets, and gaveliberty to a Commander of a Boat whom he knew was alli'd to Clelius, on condition that he would deliver the same to Clelia. This person at his return to Rome made good his word to Aronces, and went to carry the Prince's Letter to that Illustrious Roman Lady, who found these words in it.

ARONCES to CLELIA.

Since it has not been my fortune to be any wise concern'd in the danger of this daies action, know, 'tis alwaies with regret that I fight against Rome, and that for your sake I comfort myself more easily for loosing an occasion of honour, because I am more solicitous to give you testimonies of love, than to shew signs of courage to all the world. The Prisoners I send you back, will tell how highly I respect all that belong to Clelius. This is all can be said to you at present by a Prince, who has the unhappiness to be in an Army that is Enemy to Rome, and who is faithful enough to adore you in the midst of your Enemies.

This Letter gave much joy to Clelia, but withal it augmented her persecution; for Clelius understanding it, told her, she was infinitely culpable for receiving it; that there could no longer be an innocent correspondence between her and Aronces, since himself prohibited it; and that Rome having daily greater obligation to Horatius, it behov'd her to look upon him as the man that was infallibly to marry her at the end of the War. Clelia answer'd to this speech of her father with her accusom'd constancy; & tho she said nothing inconsistent with the respect she ow'd to such a relation, yet withal she said nothing prejudicial to the fidelity she had promis'd to her Lover. In the mean time, to keep up the peoples hopes, who were troubled that the Enemies had again stopt up the passages of the River, sallies were frequently made upon them, and one day the herds of Cattle were driven forth out of the City, both to signifie to the Besiegers that they wanted nothing, as also to let the people to see, that it was not so straitly begirt. Moreover Publicola had a design to draw the Enemies to a conflict by this Stratagem, imagining they would soon have notice that the droves of Cattle were to go out of the City; for every day some treacherous slaves slunk out of the City into the Enemies Camp. Publicola therefore commanded Herminius to go with a small number of resolute Souldiers and ly in ambush along the great way of the Gabinians, in a little wood two miles distant from the City; and appointed Spurius who was accompani'd with a troop of young men lightly armed, to stay at the Colline-gate till the Enemies were pass'd by it, to the end to intercept their way of return. On the other side, the second Consul went forth at another gate, and getting to the top of mount Clelinum with foot only, he appear'd first to the Enemies with the Romane Ensigns, to the end to draw them out to fight. And accordingly Tarquin, whose quarter was on that side, first sending his forragers to attempt the driving away the Cattle, commanded other Troops to second them, who halstned to the place whither they were directed, with all the eagerness that useth to be in people that hope to make a great booty. Herminius no sooner saw them advanc'd, but giving them a smart charge, he drave them towards the second Consul. The Tarquinians thereupon ralli'd themselves, and encouraging one another to fight stoutly, made head on both sides: but at the same instant a great noise arising about the Colline, and the Nevian-gates, they understood they were inclos'd round; so that on a sudden losing their courages, they forsook their ranks, and were all taken or cut in picces. Whereupon the people beholding the Prisoners brought in, and afterwards the Cattle, fell into an excessive joy, without considering that the City was thereby no better provided for than before. But the Consuls, Clelius, Horatius, Herminius and all the other chief Romans well understood that this small advantage was far from being decisive of the main War, and that unless the Forts were taken that defended the broken bridge which the Enemies had repair'd, it was impossible to have the River free on that side, and consequently Rome could not long hold out. Therefore they resolv'd to make a great attempt to accomplish this; which resolution was kept with much secretie, to the end they might, if possible, surprize the Enemies. Nevertheless they accounted it fit to defer the execution of this design for some daies, during which nothing pass'd very considerable either in the Camp of Posenna or in Rome. In the mean time Aronces omitted nothing to which honor obliged him, and was depriv'd of all consolation, saving what the conversation of the Princess of the Leontines, and the generous Melintha gave him. The Prince Titus was also very much much devoted to his interest, and Telamur acquitting himself of the promise he had made to Octavius, rendered him all offices in his power. As for Tarquin, his solicitude of regaining the Throne wholly took him up; Sextus liv'd after his accustomed manner, to wit, as voluptuously in the Camp, as in time of peace: the fierce Tullia bestir'd her self continually at Tarquinius to promote the design of Porfenna, who aim'd at the glory of compelling the Romans to receive a King from his hand: But altho War be a great affair which employ's all the world, even to those which go not to it, notwithstanding there wanted not some persons at Rome who diverted themselves agreeably; and War and Love have such a sympathy, that they sometimes produce one another, and often subsist together without mutual prejudice. Thus there wanted not good company at the houses of Domitia, Valeria's Mother, Sulpicia, Berelisa, Cesonia, and divers other houses of quality: and all the Lovers, how courageous soever, fail'd not to find opportunities to make visits to their mistresses. They also who were not amorous, but yet had pleasant wits, and were of a debonair humor, frequently diverted themselves with the misfortunes of others. Amilcar found pleasure to himself in a hundred things, which nevertheless had something of sadness in themselves. Damon furnish'd him with a sufficiently ample subject, for tho he hated Amilcar ever since he perceiv'd that he derided him, in pretending to remember what he had been before he came into the world, yet he thought him of the Sect of Pythagoras, and that he wanted only firmness enough of mind to own an opinion publicly, which was generally so little receiv'd. Wherefore being very ill of the wound he had received at the attack of the Tarquinius bridge, and believing he should die (tho his attendants thought otherwise) out of Zeal to the Sect he was of, he sent to desire Amilcar to come to see him; for one of the principal Precepts of Pythagoras was, Never to sleep with hatred in the Heart. Now Damon having pass'd many daies and nights without being able to cease hating Amilcar, desir'd to see him before he di'd, that he might be reconcil'd to him and admonish him, since they were of the same Sect, not to make a secret of it, but to maintain that important verity; wishing passionately, that he might retain the remembrance of it when his Soul should be inclos'd in another body, as he believ'd it would in a short time. Amilcar at first much commiserated the prepossessed fancy of a man whom he saw really very sick. But there being no hope to cure him thereby, he answer'd him according to his desire. When he was gone out of his chamber, and had that object of compassion no longer before his eyes, and moreover understood by those that attended on Damon, that whatever he fanci'd, there was no danger of his dying, his jolly humor could not let pass so ample a subject of divertisement, but at night he compos'd a Dialogue between himself and Damon, which the next morning he sent to Plotina by an unknown person. When Plotina receiv'd the Pasquil, Valeria, Berelisa, Clidamira, Herminius, and Anacreon were in her chamber. The hand being also unknown to her (for Amilcar had caus'd his composition to be written by one of his Attendants) she imagined it might haply be something to declare her condition to her, and inform her who she was. Wherefore rising up to open it, and withdrawing towards the window, she was immediately surpriz'd upon reading these words;

A Dialogue between Damon sick, and Amilcar in health.

This odd Title excited such laughter in her, that Anacreon told her she would be very unjust if she depriv'd the company of reading that which made her so pleasant. I assure you (answer'd she) 'tis not my intention, for I think the pleasure the company will receive in seeing that which is sent me, will augment my own. And accordingly Plotina, having resum'd her seat, and intreated her Auditors not to interrupt her, began to read that which follows, with that sweet and agreeable Air that was natural to her.

A Dialogue between Damon sick, and Amilcar in health.

Amilcar.

What has mov'd you to send for me? Am I not your Rival, and consequently your Enemy?

Damon.

Alas! When a man is at a point of death, and perhaps ready to become a Crane the same moment, he has no longer power to hate any person: for, in brief, Amilcar, I may undergo that destiny if the Gods please, and if Pythagoras be not mistaken.

Amilcar.

Since I conceive Cranes are very beastful (for in my opinion they are birds which do not much torment themselves with the affairs of this world) I should as soon chuse to be a Crane in health, as to besick Damon. But however, for what reason have you sent for me hither?

Damon.

To conjure you that you would cease deriding the Doctrine of the greatest Philosopher that ever liv'd; since I am fully perswaded you are of his opinion, and 'tis only out of an evil bashfulness that you dare not own it seriously.

Amilcar.

But what are you concern'd whether I believe that which you do, or no?

Damon.

'Tis because I would be assur'd to leave a Pythagorean Lover to Plotina, to the end he might perswade her of so important a truth as that of the Metempsychosis (or transmigration of Souls) is.

Amilcar.

How? Would you have me perswade her, that perhaps she has been a Stork, and may possibly become a Hinde; which are difficult matters to believe, when one is not accustomed thereto? I, that cannot perswade her that I love her passionately, tho it be sufficiently probable for a man that has black eyes, an aery mind, and a sensible heart, to love the most charming person in the world?

Damon.

At least be so generous to perswade Plotina, that if the Gods hear my prayers, my Soul shall pass into the body of some pretty little Dog, which may divert her, tho she should receive it from your hand.

Amilcar.

Could I know you in that condition, I should beware of giving you to my Mistress; for you might be so dispos'd as to retain the hatred of a Rival under the form of a Dog, and to bite me as one of those Creatures when possess'd with madness, if I should offer to kiss the border of her robe.

Damon.

Alas! What then can I wish to be, that I may once again enjoy the presence of Plotina?

Amilcar.

Verily I think your case very hard herein; according to all likelihood, you can never see your self her Lover again, tho tho the same moment ensuing your death should be the first of your second life: for twenty years hence you would be quite a new Lover, whom she would much condemn; and besides, she makes so little reckoning of her beauty at this day, that it's likely she would then much less esteem it. But if you will believe me, desire to become a Mouse, and to be hid in her closet. I have sometimes made a Metamorphosis of a Mouse into a woman, doe you make one of a Lover into a Mouse.

Damon.

But you do not consider that she would not love me, but rather do all she could to cause me to be taken.

Amilcar.

You have reason, and I am mistaken; not but that, according to the example of the Mouse I once told you of, which gnaw'd Mars's Love-letters, you might have pleasure enough in gnawing all the sweet Letters that should be written to her; and especially mine.

Damon.

'Tis true; but however, I cannot think fit to become a Mouse.

Amilcar.

Indeed 'tis sufficiently difficult to chuse to be a Beast in the company of Plotina.

Damon.

Yet I should rather like to be some poor little Animal and made much of, than to be a Lover and ill treated.

Amilcar.

Every one has his fancie; but in conclusion, what doe you resolve upon?

Damon.

To die without knowing what I would be, that I might still serve for something to Plotina.

Amilcar.

Trouble your self no more about this matter; for I swear to you with all the sincerity of a Rival, that whatever you may possibly become, I will make you serve for divertisement to Plotina as often as I shall talk with her about your Pythagorean opinions. And now die with joy, since you can have no greater contentment, having troubled her during your life, than after your death, to serve for the pleasure of the fairest and most amiable person in the world.

It must needs be confest (said Plotina smiling) that Amilcar is not over-wise; for certainly 'tis he that made this Toy. Rather say (answer'd Valeria) that he is an agreeable person, and of an ingenious and diverting humor. For if Damon did not speak what is in the Dialogue, 'tis possible he might, according to the humor that I understand he is of. 'Tis true (reply'd Herminius) that a man who could believe Amilcar remembered he had been a Phoenix, might say all, that is here ascrib'd to him. I beseech you (said Berelisa to Plotina) give me a Copy of this Dialogue. And I desire the same favour (added Clidamira) and if you please, will writ it out immediately. Amilcar's consent must be ask'd (answered Plotina seeing him enter) for no question he has more right than I in what you demand. I do not think that can be (said he) tho I know not what you speak of. We speak (answer'd she) of the pleasant Dialogue between Damon sick, and Amilcar in health. How? (cry'd he) as for the Amilcar you speak of, I assure you I do not know him; but thanks to your eyes, he that speaks to you is more sick than Damon. Since your malady does not appear in your aspect (answer'd Plotina) it is not ealie to believe you; therefore you may please to suffer me to take you for the Amilcar in health, who has made Damon speak a thousand follies, and who alone can grant me permission to give Berelisa a Copy of the Dialogue which he has made. Amilcar thereupon said, it was true he had a discourse with Damon which deserv'd to be witten, but he endeavor'd to deny that he had sent any thing to Plotina. Yet it was in vain; for all the company so confidently maintain'd that it was he, that he could no longer defend himself. Well then, Madam (said he to Plotina) since 'tis your pleasure I should pass for the Author of the Dialogue in question, I consent to it, for I am the most complacent person in the world. Since 'tis so (said Berelisa) you shall give me a copy of what you have made. If Damon dies (answered Plotina) I shall consent to it; but if he does not, I conceive it will be best not to let this toy run abroad in the world, for fear at length he be angry in good earnest. On the contrary (reply'd Amilcar) if he dies, 'tis fit it die with him; but if he escape, as they who attend him believe, I care not if it be seen: for since Damon is of a Sect according to which it is not lawful to sleep with hatred in the heart, he will doe me no great mischief. In truth (said Valeria) I conceive, whether Damon die or no, 'tis best to give no copy of Amilcar's Dialogue, tho it be very agreeable. Your goodness extends too far, Madam (answer'd Berelisa) and 'tis enough to say only that 'tis not fit to publish this pleasant Toy, but too much that it ought not to be given to any whatsoever, since delightful things are not made with intent not to be seen. No (reply'd Amilcar) but foolish things, as this in question is, ought not to be made common. Nevertheless (said Berelisa) when a copy of them is given to a discreet person who promises not to lend them, and swears to be faithful, to entrust them is not all one as to publish them. The world (said Plotina) is full of such discreet persons who promise all, and perform nothing which they promise. But for my part (answer'd Berelisa) I am not of that number, and none can be more exact than I am. For my particular (said Clidamira) when only Verses, Sonnets, or such like things are delir'd I sometimes suffer my self to be perswaded to shew them, tho I have promis'd the contrary, because for the most part I believe they who make so great secrets of such kind of trifles, do it not but only to make them be thought the better. All such little infidelities (answered Berelisa maliciously) produce a strong disposition to greater. I am of Berelisa's opinion (reply'd Herminius) and for that reason I judge it requisite to accustom ones self to be exact even in the concernment of small things. In good earnest (said Amilcar) 'tis more trouble than 'tis imagin'd to keep a secrecie of trifles: for as for those greater serious secrets (added he) all people keep them that have but a little sense of Honor, or only a little prudence. But as for the secrets of Verses, Sonnets, Dialogues, or pleasant Novels, 'tis very difficult not to reveal them to some or other. Nevertheless, I confest 'tis dangerous enough to give Copies of Letters or Verses, when 'tis not desir'd they should be common. For the more loth you are to have them seen, the more they are shewn; and which is worst, such Copies pass through ignorant hands, who change and pervert the sense of the Copies which they transcribe. I remember I one day made a Sonnet which I was unwilling should goe abroad at that time; yet I gave it to a Lady who promis'd me not to shew it to any person living: the first Stanza was this which I shall repeat to you, if my memory doe not deceive me.

Reason

*Reason and Love are at perpetual strife:
Who so with that partaker is,
Becomes an Enemy to this.
But without Love there's no content in life.*

Nevertheless this faithful friend who should not have shewn it to any one, gave it privately to a friend of hers, that Friend to a Lover, that Lover to another Mistress (for I am not the only man in the world that has more than one Mistress at a time) that Mistress to a Kinswoman that sung well, and that Kinswoman to a Master that taught her Musick, who immediately made an Air to it. But this miserable Stanza having pass'd through several hands, was so transform'd, that I could scarce own it: see how that simple fair one sung it.

*Destiny and Love are at perpetual strife:
Who so with that partaker is,
Becomes an Enemy to this.
But without cause to laugh's a pleasant life.*

* Seriously (said Plotina smiling) I think I like this non-sense Stanza as well as the other, for the last Verse seems to me perfectly pleasant. Since it is so (said Amilcar) I consent that the Dialogue be given; for perhaps it will be as pertinently chang'd to divert you, as the Stanza of my Sonnets, which nevertheless astonish'd me when I heard that fair ignorant sing it, and account it the pleasantest thing in the world. 'Tis true (said Anacreon) this is a hard fortune. For my part, I remember I one day made an Ode, in the beginning of which I mention'd a Swallow; and as this composition had the good fortune to please, it was talk'd of sufficiently at the Court of Polycrates where I then was, and at length was so often repeated, and so many Copies made of it, that I met with one of it, in which in stead of the two first Verses which might be thus translated:

Thou in Spring-season each year dost return Too happy Swallow ———

was put

Too happy Turtle*

So that this handsome Metamorphosis being made of a Swallow into a Locust, my poor Ode became a strange peice of non-sense. But people that understand a little sense (answer'd Berelisa) perceive well that it was not made so. No doubt they do (reply'd Herminius) but sometimes there are things whose meaning cannot be conjectur'd, and all that can be known of them is, that they are not understood: Wherefore the less a man can expose himself to these events, the better; and yet they would be avoyded, if all the world were exact. 'Tis so troublesome to be always exact (answer'd Chidamira) that nothing requires more pains. All other things have their bounds, but exactness has none: it is diffus'd every where, and there is scarce any thing in which it may not be found. When exactness is excessive (reply'd Plotina) I confess 'tis something inconvenient; and if you observe, they that profess it have a kind of a constrain'd Air, their complements favour of ceremony, their familiarity is so nice that the least thing hurts it, and there is no quiet from them. He that is guided by true reason (answer'd Herminius) never address himself to any thing in the excess, but acquires a certain habit of being exact, which affords delight in stead of trouble. For I conceive they who are exact, as vertuous persons ought to be, cannot but always continue so. They are so, without perplexity, constraint, or ceremony; and because they understand exactness to be a point of elegance, that it is necessary to Society, and finally, that without it a man can promise himself nothing from any other person. For when I tell a small secret to a friend who promises me not to reveal it; if I know he is not exact, I am always in fear. Moreover, for a man to comport himself rationally in friendship, it behoves him not only to conceal what he is desir'd to keep secret, but sometimes also not to divulge things which he is not requested to be silent of; because generosity requires him to have a certain charitable discretion, even towards those that are not wise enough to be absolutely discreet in their own concerns. For indeed, it is never commendable for a man to lose an occasion of testifying to himself that he has more prudence, goodness and vertue than another. He ought to make a secret delectation to himself by acting better than others do, and account it a glory to supply the reasons of others by his own, and not be like those who more frequently speak what they never ought so much as to think, than what is fitting to be spoken. I confess (said Amilcar) they who have no exactness are sometimes injurious to others; for I remember I saw a man at Carthage, that through want of it committed the greatest extravagancies in the World. I remember one day he invited me to dine with him, but being invited himself about an hour after to another place, he made no scruple to goe thither, without so much as sending to advertise me of it. For my part (said Plotina) I shall never pardon a man who promis'd me a basket of Orange-flowers, and sent them not; and I shall remember another as long as I live, that sent twice to know whether I would be in my chamber that he might come to visit me. His messages were accompani'd with such earnestness, that imagining he desir'd to speak with me concerning a business relating to a friend of mine, of which he understood something, I broke off an appointment I had made, and sent him word, I would attend him. And so I did to no purpose, and that with very much regret. For it being a fair day, in which all the world went abroad to walk, no body came to visit me, and I was all the afternoon turning my head as often as my chamber door was open'd, thinking always 'twas he that I waited for. And which was worst, I understood in the evening that this shuttle-brain'd friend had spent the day walking with the Ladies which he met as he was coming to me. Judge therefore (said Herminius) whether the little exactness which troubled you in so inconsiderable matters, would not disgust you in more important occasions. Besides, 'tis certain, that when a person makes a custome of not being punctual in small things, he easily fails to be so in great, and consequently many times hazards the displeasure of his best friends. And therefore the surest course is to be punctual. In truth (said Amilcar) I am of opinion, all things are dubious, that there is no side but may be defended; and if I were to establish a Sect, I would have it lawful to doubt of every thing, except matters of Religion. For there is nothing we can be confident of. Many times we are ignorant of what we fancie we know, and know what we take our selves to be ignorant of. There are whole Nations which have Opinions, that pass for errors amongst others; and as all men have a constitution and temper particular to themselves; so every Kingdom, every Country, every City has its peculiar manners, customs, inclinations, and opinions too; so true it is, that reason varies according to the Climates and Nations: For the most part we believe what our Fathers believ'd before us, without searching into the reason of our belief; onely there are a few sublime Wits who pry into things in their Original; who seek to make a perfect discovery of their Opinions, and after all their pains find it almost impossible to be done. For indeed our Reason from the very first use of it is prepossess'd with the sentiments of others, and can't without violence clear it self from all that entangles it. In which respect I am perswaded, men are almost always deceiv'd, even in things wherein they think themselves erre least; and the surer course would be, as I said before, to doubt almost of every thing. And to prove what I say; is it not true, that till the daies of Pythagoras, the most learned men believ'd the Evening-Star and the Morning-Star to be two distinct Stars? And nevertheless, the knowing Philosopher has discover'd to us, that the same Star which we behold so twinkling at the beginning of night, is the same which is so fair at break of day. All men before, judg'd of it in that manner; and two names were given it, which it bears still: and yet we see manifestly that all men were mistaken. That which you say is true (answer'd Anacreon) but the same man that could discover a truth that had been unknown before, teaches a ridiculous falsehood in his Metempsychosis. 'Tis in that regard (reply'd Amilcar) that I have reason to affirm, 'tis best to doubt almost of every thing; since the greatest men are lyable to be deceiv'd in something. For my part (said Herminius) I cannot conceive that that excellent man positively believ'd that which his Disciples teach; for the Moral Precepts are so excellent, that 'tis hard to believe his Doctrine could have been so foolish. As for my particular (said Berelisa) I confess I cannot yet very well believe that he thought he remember'd he had been a Cock, and Euphorbus at the War of Troy, could be of any great judgment. Nevertheless 'tis certain (answer'd Herminius) that Pythagoras was one of the wisest men of the World. But what then (said Plotina) did he teach so Excellent? A thousand things, Madam, (answer'd Herminius) and to tell you some of them, he commanded his Disciples to honour the Gods, and never to desire any particular thing of them; maintaining, that no man knows exactly what is fit for him, and that 'tis more respectful to submit totally to the order of Heaven, than to endeavour to alter the Decrees of Destiny according to ones humor. What you say, has no doubt something very excellent in it (reply'd Valeria) for I conceive indeed that all men know not what is proper for them, and that the cause of disorder, division, and Wars in the World, is, for that in general all men desire good, and know not what it is. But to return to the excellent man you speak of, I remember I once heard the Illustrious Brutus (who was an intimate friend of the wise Damo, daughter of Pythagoras) say, that this great man compos'd a thousand excellent Verses concerning heroical Friendship. 'Tis very probable (answer'd Herminius) and to the same purpose he establish'd a Community amongst his Disciples; for he confidently maintain'd, that there ought not to be any distinct interest amongst true friends, and that where there was, there was no friendship but society: and it may be averr'd, that never any before him so well understood all the duties of true Friendship. But that which makes me love him the more, is, that he was a profest enemy to Lying, which I hate more than can be imagin'd. No doubt Lying is an evil thing (reply'd Amilcar) but to say truth, it is sufficiently hard to renounce it absolutely; and upon due observation it would be found, that even they who hate it most, sometimes make use of it, notwithstanding their detesting it. At least I know that I do upon some occasions, and shall do still many times in my life. Not that I love to lye, but it has certain little conveniences in it very necessary. For example, is it possible to make a Story delightfully without lying, or adding some circumstance to render it more pleasant? Can one commend a woman, without speaking a little more good of her than she deserves? Can one speak ill of his enemy without aggravating his fault? Can one bemoane himself in Love, without making his misery a little greater than it is? And to prosecute sincerity to the utmost, could I have compos'd the Dialogue of sick Damon, if I would have confin'd my self to the truth? All the company laugh'd at this which Amilcar said; and as Plotina was going to answer him, Emilius enter'd, and ask'd if they had heard the great news which he lately learnt. I assure you (answer'd Plotina) that we have heard none all this day. I inform you then (reply'd he) that I am just now assur'd, there is a great division between Tarquin and Porfenna, and that it may be an occasion of raising the Siege and delivering Rome. As things desir'd are easily believ'd, this news was receiv'd with joy; and tho Herminius made scruple at first of believing that Tarquin would fall out with a Prince without whose protection his case was desperate, yet he yielded at length, and discours'd upon this surprising intelligence as the rest did. A little while after, Flavia enter'd, and having taken a seat, ask'd, whether they had heard tell of the apparition of the God of Tyber, who was reported to have threatn'd Porfenna's Camp; and then making the description of that God, repeating the very words that were attributed to him, and indeed speaking as a person well perswaded of what he affirm'd was true. For my part (said Amilcar smiling) I have walk'd upon the banks of the fairest Rivers in the World, and also upon those of the River Alpheus, so famous for his love of the fair Arethusa; but none of the Deities that preside over them would never yet do me the honour to appear to me: and therefore Madam, (added he, looking upon Flavia) you must permit me to expect till the news you speak of be confirm'd, before I believe it. Flavia was going to answer, but Merigenes being enter'd hinder'd her, for beholding Amilcar in the company, he seem'd so surpris'd at it, that as soon as the first civilities were past, he could not but testify his astonishment. I thought (said he to Amilcar) you had been gone disguis'd to the Enemies Camp, to foment the division which they say is between Porfenna and Tarquin; for I just now came from speaking with a man who confidently assur'd me he saw you depart thither. Well then (said Emilius) you understand by Merigenes, that I am not the only person that have heard report of the division amongst the enemies. But if it be no more true (answer'd Herminius) that they are divid-

divided than it is that Amilcar is gone disguis'd to Porfenna's Camp, there is not much ground to rejoice at this great news. But, I beseech you (said Plotina) from whom did you learn it? From a man (answer'd Æmilius) that I seldom see but in the Publick places, where they talk of general affairs. He seems to be ingenious, speaks much and well, is not much to seek for what he would say, and affirms things so positively, that none dare doubt of what he delivers. 'Tis certainly the same (said Merigenes) that told me you were gone disguis'd to the Camp of the Enemies. May it not be the same man too (added Plotina, smiling) that acquainted Flavia with that wonderful Apparition she tells us of? To speak truth (answer'd Flavia) I think all our news comes from the same place; for Mutius who inform'd me of what I have related to you, assur'd me, he heard it reported by an ingenious person in the Grand Court of Hoftilius. 'Tis there I was told of the division of the Enemies (reply'd Æmilius). And 'tis there also that I was assur'd (added Merigenes) Amilcar was gone out of Rome disguis'd, but with all the circumstances so precise, that any other besides myself would have been deceiv'd as well as I have been. Is he a Roman (demanded Berelisa smiling) that told you all this News? No, Madam, (answer'd Æmilius) and I find his pronunciation manifests him to be a stranger. Certainly then (said Clidamira to Berelisa) 'tis a man whom we know, who accompany'd us in our passage from Cicily to Ostia. I doubt no more of it than you do (answer'd Anacreon) and accordingly describing that person to Merigenes and Æmilius, they understood 'twas he of whom he spoke. But what is this universal Impostor? (said Plotina). He is a person of extraction good enough (answer'd Berelisa) born at Lylybeum; he spent his youth in Africa, and has got such a faculty of lying, that 'tis impossible to hinder him from it. So that I think I may safely affirm, he never spoke any truth in his life, but he thought he ly'd. Nevertheless, as you were told, he is ingenious, speaks freely, and delights those sufficiently who know him not for a Lyar; for he alwaies tells new things, his wit is never exhausted, and alwaies forging matter of discourse; he talks all his life, and withal hath the art to contradict himself less than all other great Lyars. But, for that I am a lover of truth, and very much abhor lying, I cannot endure him, and he comes no more to see me. For an hour or two (reply'd Anacreon) one may be diverted by him; but continuing longer, his conversation is insupportable; for what heed soever one takes, and what resolution soever one makes not to believe him, yet one is alwaies circumvented by him; and he speaks things with so free and ingenious an air, that he is able to deceive as long as he lives. 'Tis remarkable (said Clidamira) that he has been so horribly encounter'd for his lying, at Lilybeum, that he dares live there no longer; and for that he is perswaded 'tis impossible to speak truth alwaies, he is come hither with intention to go to Præneste, to inquire, whether it be possible there should be a veracious man in the World. If he please (answer'd Amilcar) I will shorten his journey, for I will assure him sincerely, that no man alwaies speaks truth, and moreover that there are as many great Lyars as speakers of truth. As for me (said Herminius) who make a particular profession to love truth and detest lying, I wish people would absolutely conclude that it behoves never to lye. How? Never? (reply'd Plotina) I do not think it possible. For there are little Lyes of civility, which we cannot but sometimes make use of, and decency does not oblige us to decline them. There are also Lyes of generosity (added Amilcar) which sometimes are very convenient to be us'd. As for the pleasant Lyes (said Anacreon) I beg favour in behalf of them. For my part (added Clidamira) I approve using a Lye in way of excuse. For that I fear death much (answer'd Flavia) when I am very sick, I am contented that people should Lye, and tell me alwaies I shall recover, tho' they do not believe so. As for me (said Valeria) I will never use a Lye, unless when it may serve to save the life of some person. For my part (said Merigenes) I should extremely scruple to tell the least Lye in the world; but I confess, perhaps I might Lye, at the command of a Mistress. In good earnest (said Berelisa) there are more Lyars, than I imagin'd. Some there are to (answer'd Æmilius) who are Lyars, tho' they do not think themselves to be such. But since we are in the humor of speaking truth (reply'd Plotina) I beseech you let us establish Laws which may instruct us how far 'tis lawful to Lye. I confess (said Herminius) I am of opinion it behoves to have a general purpose, of Lying at no time, and not to produce in our selves a habit of those small Lies, which are not scrupl'd by any, and to which people insensibly become accusom'd. For since no crime is so easie to be committed, nor of more frequent conveniency than a Lye, we ought to restrain our selves from it to our power, and look upon Lying as a cowardly, low, weak, and infamous thing, arguing a less fear of the Gods than of men. But on the other side, we ought to look upon Truth as the Soul of Honesty, if I may so speak. And forasmuch as scarce any thing besides Speech distinguishes Men from Brutes, as being the image of their Reason, whose falsities it, renders himself unworthy to be a man. Beasts have no deceitful cries, except those terrible Animals that are bred upon the banks of Nilus; there is none but man, whose wickedness perverts the use of the Voice. Moreover, truth is the Universal bond, which maintains order in the World; the Publick-Faith, the Law of Nations, and Justice are founded upon it. It bears the supreme sway in Love and Friendship; without it, the World would be nothing but confusion, all men would be cheats, cowards, and impostors; and there would be neither honour nor pleasure in the World, if truth were banisht out of it. There is no greater inconvenience then a servant that is a Lyar, that assures you he has done what you commanded him, when he has not so much as thought of it. For my part, I confess to the shame of my Reason, I partly owe the hatred I bear against Lying, to a Lying slave that I had, who caus'd me to lose my patience a hundred times, and spoyl'd the order of my affairs by his continual falsehoods. For he was so excessive at it, that sometimes he affected as much to accuse himself by lying, as to justify himself by speaking truth. But to return where I was; is there any thing more insufferable than an Artisan, who promises you what you have commanded him, and deceives you continually? Is there any thing more odious than the practice of those Great persons, who with favourable words cause a thousand favours to be hop'd from them, which they have resolv'd not to grant? Is there any thing more cruel, than to discover that a friend whom you love, did not tell you truth, when he told you, he lov'd you above all the rest of the World?

And

And lastly, is there any thing more insupportable, than to have a Mistress that swears to love none but you, and nevertheless loves several other persons, or (to speak more properly) loves none? for a divided love is no love. A Lye serves for dissimulation, fraud, perfidiousness, cowardise, and almost all crimes, and 'tis only weakness or imprudence to make use of it. For a man continually incurs the commission of a crime that can never be committed but in publick, and by endangering himself to be convinc'd of it. To lye for nothing, is folly; to Lye for interest, is a great crime, since certainly there is nothing so contrary to the Gods as Lying; the Gods, I say, who are so true in the Oracles which they render. And moreover, do not we see that the search of Truth is the universal design of all men, and especially of the wife? That which I find yet more pernicious in Lying (said Merigenes) is, that it is a poyson which speedily communicates it self, and whose effect is scarce possible to be afterwards stoppt. For when any one relates a Lye in company, all that hear it Lye after him with confidence, and cause all others to Lye, to whom they impart such false relation; so that I conceive Herminius has reason in condemning Lying as much as he does. As for all great Lyes (answer'd Amilcar) I think no man can justify the practice of them at any time. I condemn the middle sort too (added Plotina) but as for those small ones which are in use all over the world, I think 'tis no easie matter to be able to disclaim them. For my part (said Herminius. I condemn all sorts; yet perhaps I can pardon some, but if I might prevail, none at all should be permitted. But then (said Plotina) 'tis requisite I should be fully instructed in this point, and propound Questions to the Company, which may teach me and correct me for the future. In the first place (said Herminius) it behoveth never to make either a great or a little Lye which may prejudice any person whatsoever; for since Justice and Generosity require not men to speak endammaging truths, they are far from permitting injurious Lyes. What you say, seems so equitable and generous (answered Plotina) that I will not contradict it: but however will you license those officious Lies which turn to the benefit of our Friends, or serve to conceal their faults? I love my friends very well (reply'd Herminius) and I am very joyful at any occasion to serve them; but if I should be unable to do them a courtesie except by Lying, I should be extremely perplex'd. Then you would suffer me to die for want of a Lie? (said Valeria smiling) I find I could not (answer'd Herminius) but I confess, I should have very much regret to save your life by a way so little honourable; for in brief, every Lye is a crime, and all I can do in favour of officious Lies, is to account them excusable in certain occasions. But when a Lye injures none (said Amilcar) and benefits some person, is it not innocent? A Lye (answer'd Herminius) never fails to hurt him that uses it, tho it should injure no other person, and be only his own Lye; since it renders him less vertuous: and all that can be said, is, that to hinder a Friend from falling into a great misfortune, kindness may prevail above truth. But as for what concerns me, I confess, I should scruple to secure my self from a very considerable mischief by a Lye. Sincerely (reply'd Plotina) my generosity does not go so high as yours; for if I ly'd in behalf of another, I should also Lye in favour of my self. I am of your mind (said Amilcar) Nevertheless, that which Herminius says is very noble and generous (an-swer'd Merigenes) for I think it shameful to Lye for ones self in any occasion; and it were better to undergo the mischief that threatens us, than avoid it by such means: so that I conclude, a man may Lye to save his Friend's life or liberty, but never for his own interests. I maintain too (said Herminius) that Lying is always a crime, and that even when a man Lies to save his friend's Life, he ought to do it with reluctancy and sorrow, because all Lying is unworthy of a man of honour. Moreover it ought not to be conceiv'd, that there is but one sort of Lyes, since there are a hundred different kinds. 'Tis oftentimes to make a Lye, not to speak a truth that is requisite to be spoken; and dissimulation is so dangerous a concomitant of Lying, that they may be confounded one with another. I confess (said Plotina) I could sometimes have justifi'd certain persons, if I would have declar'd what I knew: but I care not to oppose what people speak affirmatively, especially when it concerns only indifferent persons, and who are accus'd of no great crimes. But why will you by your silence (said Valeria) charge your self with a Lye which you do not speak? For if you can refute it, you are culpable of it; and I conceive well that Herminius has reason, when he saies, there are several kinds of Lyes; for there are Lies in deeds as well as in words, Lying looks, deceiving signs, dissembling smiles, and a Lying silence. Valeria has reason (said Anacreon) and I think too there are Lying civilities, and Lying courtesies; for sometimes people do services to some persons whom they hate, because they have need of them in some occasion, and to others out of fear and weakness; sometimes also they make shew of being glad to see persons that are extremely distasteful to them. I assure you (answer'd Berelisa) Clidamira is the person that of all the world has most of this Lying civility you speak of: for 'tis not three daies ago, since a young slave came to tell her there was a man desir'd to see her; Clidamira had no sooner heard his name, but she grew red with anger, because the slave had not told him she was not at home; then she sought all waies possible to cause him not to make his visit long, and gave order that a quarter of an hour after his coming, word should be brought her that she was expected elsewhere. After which, changing her countenance, action, and speech, it may be said she ly'd all the waies that can be in receiving this man. For she saluted him with an obliging smile, she caus'd him to sit down with all imaginable civility, and began to entertain him with so pleasing an air, that I am confident the poor man thought he should pass the whole afternoon with her, and that he did her the greatest pleasure in the world in visiting her. Nevertheless it is certain his presence was extremely disgustful to her. I confess it (said Clidamira) but how can we tell unwelcome persons that they are so? It would be discourteous to tell them so (reply'd Berelisa) but yet 'tis not necessary to make such a false countenance to them; 'tis enough to shew them only a kind of cold civility, that is inoffensive on the one side, and on the other is not treacherous, and does not attract people that are not lik'd. But does not all the world use to do so? (said Clidamira). For my part (answer'd Valeria) I could not. I confess ingenuously (said Plotina) sometimes I can Lye in this manner, but not so perfectly as Clidamira; for they that understand my glances and smiles, perceive well when they are feigned or sincere. In earnest (said Amilcar) you could not deceive me with them. But I would know further ther (said Plotina) whether Herminius, who loves truth so much, does not make complements, as others do. Nevertheless, to speak sincerely, all complements are Lies. I grant it (answer'd Herminius) but for that they are known to be such, and no person laies any solid foundation upon complements, they are Lyes without malignity. People know well enough that no great credit will be given to them, they are return'd as they are receiv'd; and I conform to custome without scruple, yet with such moderation, that I make as few as I can. But as for pleasant Lies (reply'd Anacreon) you do as little condemn them; and should I go about to make a delightful relation, you would allow me to add something to the History; for truth has for the most part somewhat too serious in it, which does not delight so much as fiction. As for this sort (said Herminius) I think they may be permitted; for since stories are no more believ'd than complements, I leave your fancy liberty to invent what pleases it; and moreover, it belongs properly to you to enjoy the privilege of lying innocently. Indeed to speak strictly, there are no lyes innocent but those that are related for lyes, as all the ingenious Fables of the Poets; yet they ought to have the appearance and shew of truth; so true it is, that a lye is foul and unhandsome of it self. Yet there is a sort of lying (reply'd Amilcar) which is an inseparable companion of vanity; and I should be sorry if there were none of it in the world: for the lyers that use it, sometimes give me sufficient divertisement. What lyers do you speak of? (said Plotina). Of those (answer'd Amilcar) who commend themselves, every one according to their fancy: for some people are guilty of the weakness to desire the world would believe them to have a greater reputation than they have, and tell a thousand lies to make it believ'd. There are Hectors who make long relations of dangerous enterprises, in which they never were; these are false Gallants, who pretend to good fortune, and spend the nights in devising amorous adventures, and the whole days in relating of them, as if they had hapned to themselves. I know some such, as well as you (reply'd Plotina) and I know others as very fools too: for I know a man that had the impudence to tell me he was descended in a direct line from Danae, and yet 'tis known he is of a very mean birth. However, he has made a long Pedegree, with which he tires such as give him the hearing. As for false pretenders to Heraldry (said Anacreon) they distaste me as well as those that would seem wealthy, and think to keep themselves from being poor by lying. I assure you (answer'd Amilcar) I know some people very rich, that lye as ridiculously as these, who have a fancy to make it believ'd, that all that belongs to them is dearer than it is really, and devise a hundred extravagant lyes to publish their false magnificence. There are some likewise (said Merigenes) who have the boldness to say they have given things which it would not be often in their power to bestow. I know other lyers also (added Anacreon) that are sufficiently extravagant, namely, such as when they have been puzzled by some person in discourse, without knowing what to say, make the handsomest answers in the world at home, and which is more notorious, relate the same afterwards as if they made them upon the place. Moreover there are some (added Clidamira) so vain as to report that persons of quality write to them, and go to see them, tho they never so much as thought of them. The sum of all is (said Hermini- us) that there are many fools and lyars in the world, and that I have reason to hate Lying perfectly. They that lye to prejudice others (added Anacreon) are worse than they that lye to commend themselves; but I look upon it as so ridiculous to tell lies out of vanity, that I find my inclination would sooner lead me to utter some lye a little malicious, than to commend my self, like those above mention'd. Yet some of those that lye in their own commendation (answer'd Amilcar) cause me to pity them, because they do it according to their judgments, and having a better conceit of themselves than there is reason for, lye innocently; but the worst for them is, that tho 'tis commonly said, The way to deceive others, is to decieve ones self, yet they do not perswade any to be of their opinion. But I beseech you (said Plotina) tell me further what you think of those that write careless and lying Letters both together, I think the same of them (answer'd Herminius) as of those who speak lying civilities. In earnest (reply'd she after a little musing) if truth were well establish'd in the world, people would speak almost nothing of what they use to speak. This intimates (said Amilcar) that we ought not to trust too much in your words. For the future (answer'd she) I promise you to be the truest person in the world; for to speak freely, all that Herminius has said in behalf of truth, and against lying, hath so affected me, that I will never lye more at all. And to shew you that I have profited well by what he has said, I conclude also with him, that every Lye is a crime, that if it were possible, lying ought in no case to be practis'd, that 'twere good never to employ a Lye to do a benefit, that it is less criminal to lye for saving the life of ones Friend, than ones own; that lying good-turns argue weakness, that dissimulation is a baseness, that lying civilities are blameable, that to lye for ones own commendation is ridiculous, and that complements are lyes so known, that they do no mischief to any; that there is an implicate lying in silence, which ought to be avoided; that the custome and habit of the least lies is a great fault, and that the Poets are the onely Lyars that deserve to be commended. You have undoubtedly benefited by the discourse (said Valeria) but methinks it might be further askt, whether a Lye be not more criminal in writings than in words? Do not doubt it, Madam, (said Herminius) and I wonder all the company has left this to be observ'd by Valeria. In brief (added Anacreon) I conceive that of all the manners in which lying can appear, there is none more criminal and unworthy than that of certain mean wits, all whose faculties and genius consisting in their own malignant humour, they employ themselves onely to heap falsities together, to the end to compose Satyrs of them. 'Tis possible no doubt, to make innocent Satyrs (said Herminius), but they ought to be against vices in general; and such as these do not make use of lying, but altogether of truth. But as for such as are made against particular persons, lying and calumny are inseparable from them, they are alwaies the issues of hatred or envy; and the composers being never able to keep themselves from Lying, are the most criminal of all others that practise it. For they endeavour to fix a Lye (if I may so speak) to render it immortal if they could, to impose upon posterity, and to accuse people even when they shall be no longer in a condition to defend themselves. But whereas the Gods are just, those whose hearts are so ill temper'd as to affect making Satyrs, are alwayes hated and despis'd. even by them that laugh most at their calumniating lyes. They are like Tygers and Panthers amongst men; people desire to see them out of curiositie, but not to have them at their own houses. They are fear'd even when they sport themselves, and no trust can ever be put in them. And to speak freely, there is reason not to desire friends which are declared Enemies of Justice Humanity, Vertue, and Truth. I see well (said Valeria) that all the companie approves what Herminius has said; but I know not whether a Lye may be excusable in War and in Love, and whether equivocal and ambiguous answers which seem to be in the middle between truth and fallhood, may be permitted. As for equivocal answers (said Herminius) as they are the products of subtilty and deceit, I have great inclination to condemn them absolutely, saving in certain occasions wherein out of goodncs we desire to avoyd speaking truths that are disadvantageous to any. Moreover, I should not love to find my self constrain'd to use them, and to speak sincerely; it behoves alwayes to answer according to the intention or meaning of the person spoken to, and not to endeavour to deceive him. As for lyes which are made in war (said Anacreon) I do not account them criminal, because as soon as War is proclaim'd, each party distrusts the other. I confess it (said Herminius) but yet I am assur'd no Heroe would take upon him the office of a Spy, or get a Victory to his party, only by a lying speech, without being otherwise instrumental to it. Wherefore without going about to examine whether in general a Lye be lawful in War, I confidently affirm, that I would never take a Commission to lye, and I should alwayes chuse rather to fight the Enemies, than to deceive them. But as for Lovers (said Amilcar) if you absolutely deprive them of the priviledge of lying, you take away all their strength. For true Lovers (answer'd Herminius) I think that at utmost I should but permit them to lye in Verse, provided they always speak truth in prose. But the case is not the same in reference to light impertinent Lovers, for I license them to speak all they please; for since they are in no great danger of being believ'd unless by Gossips that deserve to be gull'd, 'tis not needful to deny them their feigned sighs, and deceitful tears, flattering lyes, dissembled despairs, and a thousand other counterfeited toys. Should you have been all your life as very a flatterer as I (reply'd Amilcar) you would not better understand the practices of extravagant Lovers. If he has not been such (said Valeria smiling) he may be; and I know not if he follow'd his inclination, whether he would not be so a little. I detest lying so much (answer'd Herminius) that methinks I ought not to be suspected to be lyable to become a fond Lover; especially by the amiable Valeria, who is the fittest person in the world to cure those that honour her particularly, of such malady. Herminius had scarce ended these words, but one came to advertise him, that Publicola desir'd his presence; wherefore he departing at the same instant, the discourse was alter'd for a small time, and soon after the Company separated. Yet Plotina made an observation which caus'd her to judge it harder to speak truth alwayes, than it seem'd; for all the civilities made by these several persons, were for the greatest part more flattering than sincere. Herminius was no sooner arriv'd at Publicola's house, but he understood it was requisite to hasten that design of attacking the two Forts of the Enemies, because it was known they were making new entrenchments, which would render the taking of them impossible, if it were longer deferr'd. An hour after, a Council of War having been secretly held, at which the second Consul Clelius, Horatius, Artemidorus, Themistius, Mutius, Octavius, Herminius, Æmilius, and some others were present. It was resolv'd not to attempt the taking both the Forts at the same time, because the Roman Troops would be too weak, if they were divided; and therefore that only a false assault should be made upon the Fort that was hardest to win, and in the mean time all the Troops should march directly to the other Fort. To this end Gabions, sheds of boards, faggots, platforms, rams, and other engines necessary in like occasions were provided; and for that the Romans would not be commanded but by a Roman, Horatius had the general command, and under him Artemidorus, Themistius, Octavius, Herminius, Æmilius, Mutius, and Spurius, had the chief Offices. Merigence, Amilcar, Meleagenes, Acrisius, Damon, Sicinius, and all the other gallants mingled themselves amongst the Bands, or ranked themselves neer Horatius. As for the Consuls, they stay'd in Rome for the security of the City, and to send relief to Horatius in case he needed it, or to succour and receive him in case he were repell'd. But as a secret is the most difficult thing in the world to keep, when an enterprize of this nature is in agitation, Porfenna and Tarquin understanding the secret preparations that were making at Rome, did not doubt but they were intended for the storming of one of the two Forts; wherefore their Army being very numerous, they provided likewise to sustain both assaults. Aronces commanded on one side, and Titus on the other; the Prince of Messene, tho a little inconvenienc'd with the slight wound he receiv'd at the attaque of the Bridge, did not fail to accompany Aronces. The brave Lucilius, brother of the generous Melintha, was also on that side, and so were Mamilius Tarquin's son in-law, Telanus, Theanor, and several others; Sextus not daring to take any command, out of policy, for fear of incensing the Romans too much, and making them more valiant by their hatred of him, continued neer Tarquin, who commanded the Body of the Reserve, that he might succour those that should need it. But at length the day appointed for this grand action being come, the one side prepar'd to make a stout assault, and the other to sustain the force of the Assailants. Then it was that Clelia had an extreme great agitation of mind, for she doubted not but that this would be a very dangerous encounter, and that Aronces would expose himself to the greatest hazards of the day. And indeed this valiant Prince to comfort himself for not having fought in the most dangerous place when the Bridge was attack'd, resolv'd to signalize his courage this day, especially having understood that Horatius had the command of the Roman Troops for the execution of this enterprize. Not but that when he consider'd that he serv'd Tarquin who was a Tyrant, who had used Clelia unworthily, and was still amorous of her, and moreover when he reflected that he fought for Sextus who was the cause of Lucretia's death, and afterwards of that of the Illustrious Brutus; he resented an excessive grief, and judg'd it an intolerable cruelty to hinder provision from entering into a City where his Mistress was inclos'd. It was also very hard for him to see himself with his sword

in his hand against his dearest friends: but however, honour and nature tying him to the side of the King his father, and his hatred of Horatius animating him to a new desire of glory, he dispos'd himself to fight with a certain kind of boldness, which raising fierceness in his eyes, made him seem to have a more high aspect when he was at the head of the Troops. The opinion of Tarquin was only to sustain the charge of the Romans in the Fort, but that of Aronces was to march out and meet them, and present them with battle. And this advice being follow'd, he went to take a stand between Rome and the Fort that was to be attack'd, and so marshall'd the Troops he had with him, that one would have said all Porcenna's Army was in the place. When the Roman Forces which march'd in order, appear'd, the two Armies were soon in a posture to joyn battle. Horatius beholding Aronces in the head of his Forces, was extreme joyful that he had an opportunity to draw his sword against him without ingratitude; and Aronces knowing him, felt all the motions in his breast, that hatred, love, and glory are able to inspire. the Romans being the Assailants, Horatius march'd up first to the Enemies, after having encourag'd them which were to follow him, both by his voice and action. Almost at the same time, Aronces, follow'd by all his party, advanc'd, and so bore up against the shock of the Enemies, that in stead of being broken by them, he broke their Forces. This is the day (cry'd Aronces speaking to Horatius) that must end all our differences. At these words the valiant Prince redoubling his ordinary valour, charg'd his Rival with such violence, that he gave him no time to deliberate what to doe, because he was constrain'd to defend himself. Yet he did not forget himself in this conflict, but as he ward off Aronces first blows, since my deliverer (said he) will take away my life, which he has sav'd more than once, I must shew him at least, that I know well how to defend it. Hereupon ensued a furious combat between these two valorous Rivals, and Horatius found himself in more danger by having to bear up against the single valour of Aronces, than he had been when he alone sustain'd the whole power of the Enemies in defending the Sublician-Bridge. At length, Aronces having slightly wounded him in two places, wrested his sword away, took him prisoner, and deliver'd him to be guarded by some of his Souldiers. whilst himself pursu'd his advantage. But when the Romans perceiv'd the taking of Horatius, they made so great a charge to disengage him, that they recover'd him indeed, whilst Aronces was fighting against many together, who having rallied, encompass'd him about. At another place the Prince of Messene who commanded the Cavalry, perceiving Themistus his Rival and fiercest Enemy in the front of him, preparing himself to receive him, he rush'd forward with his Horse at the same time that Themistus gave speed to his; so that meeting with equal impetuosity, the Prince was dangerously wounded in the breast, and Themistus's right arm was run through. The former reeling with the blow he had receiv'd, was reliev'd by his Souldiers, who carried him off to a place of security: and Themistus being unable to bear his sword with his wounded arm, put it into his left hand, and drawing back to the second rank, did not cease to give Orders till the end of the fight. In the mean time Aronces seeing the Victory was too long disputed with him, caus'd Titus to advance, who fighting with several Interests that augmented his courage, seconded Aronces so well, that in spite of the Romans valour, they began to give ground on that side. Artemidorus seeing this disorder, and observing Titus in the head of the Romans, which were of Tarquin's party, made directly at him with his sword; but that of Titus breaking as he ward off the blow, he retir'd into the midst of his followers. But Artemidorus being unhappily carried forward by his valour in repelling the Enemies, receiv'd an Arrow into his flank, which was shot by a common Soldier, hid behind a bush; whereupon falling down, the Enemies had taken him prisoner, if Mutius follow'd by the courageous Merigenes had not arriv'd there at the instant to rescue him. Then it was that the valiant Aronces stood in need of all his courage and prudence; for he saw that notwithstanding all his endeavors, the Romans on a sudden taking heart again, had put their Troops in order; that Octavius, Mutius, and Herminius were advancing, and that his own Soldiers were ready to turn their backs to the Enemies. The Prince therefore taking up a daring and generous resolution, commanded his guards which follow'd him to kill all such of his party as offer'd to stir a foot, or refus'd to follow him. Whereupon joyning a great example of valour to this command, the fight was renew'd with more heat than before. Horatius on his part having resum'd his place, notwithstanding his wounds, perform'd his utmost either to overcome or die. So that in an instant all the forces being mix'd together, the persons of Quality all came to handy-blows, and signaliz'd themselves. Mutius perform'd admirable things, Octavius did no less. Lucilius on Aronces's party signaliz'd himself highly; Emilius fought like a brave and unhappy Lover, that hop'd for nothing, and fear'd not death; and in a word, all acquitted themselves courageously on both sides. But Aronces having too few foot, and for that to goe towards a Battalion which flank'd him there was a little Curtain to be pass'd over, where his Cavalry would be unprofitable, and besides, that his Infantry was extremely tir'd, he turn'd towards a party of his Horse-men, and propounded to them to forsake their Horses and follow him, they obey'd him, and furiously charg'd those they were to encounter. Then Aronces's Foot resum'd courage, and seeing those of Quality become equal with them in the danger they were to overcome, perform'd incredible things. In conclusion, in spite of all the valour of Horatius and the brave persons that accompani'd him, Aronces defeated them, and forc'd them to betake themselves to a retreat. Whereupon the Cavalry which were become Foot, in a moment, resum'd their Horses, pursu'd the Romans very neer to the City. Yet this retreat was made somewhat orderly; nevertheless it caus'd terrour and confusion in Rome; and had not the Consuls acted with prudence and authority, the affrighted people had shut up the gates against the Roman Troops, for fear lest the Conquerors should have enter'd together with the Conquered. The great number of the wounded which were brought back all bloody, further augmented the fear amongst the people: and if the love of Liberty had not been strongly impress'd in their hearts, they had certainly inclin'd to a surrender. Nevertheless, in the midst of the great tumult, no Roman was heard to propose the receiving of Tarquin in order to peace. On the contrary, their first fear turning into fury nothing was heard but imprecations against him, and the fierce Tullius and the most despairing amongst them them said aloud, that they ought rather to set fire on the City speedily, than deliver up themselves; that it was better to perish quickly and generously by the flames, than slowly and shamefully by famine. At length the disorder became so great, that the like was never seen. There was a universal consternation in the streets and publick places. Artemidorus being brought in as the other wounded were, occasion'd more rumors still, because he was a person of very high Quality, and extraordinary valour. The wound he had received was so dangerous, that the Chirurgions would not promise for his life. Whereupon all his friends were extremely troubled, and Berelisa and Clidamira taking no care but for the preservation of this Prince, employ'd themselves in performing all services he needed in this condition. As for Themistus and Horatius, their wounds were so little dangerous, that they were not necessitated to keep the chamber. Clelia had very different sentiments in so great a disorder; for she lov'd her Country, she pity'd all its calamities, and hated Tarquin: but for that she affected not Horatius, and lov'd Aronces, it was something troublesome to her not to rejoice that the latter had overcome the other. But judging this secret joy criminal, she soon chang'd it into a lawful sorrow. Just Gods! (said she to her self, sighing) wherefore doe you permit me the use of hatred and affection; since my fortune is dispos'd in such sort, that I can neither love nor hate without a crime, nor grieve nor rejoice innocently? If I hate Horatius, I am unworthy to be a Roman, since he is a Roman that has sav'd Rome, that dayly hazards his life to defend it, and comes from shedding his own blood for the safety of my Country. On the other side, if I love Aronces, I love a Prince that besieges Rome, whose valour is employ'd to subject it to the Tyrant, or reduce it to destruction. But again; if I love Horatius, I am perfidious, unfaithful, unworthy to live: and if I hate Aronces, I am perjur'd, and the most ungrateful person in the world. What then shall I do, unfortunate as I am? (proceeded she) I will submit my self to the will of the Gods (added this admirable Lady) and without arguing so much upon events, or desiring to foresee what is to come, I will have respect towards my Father, pity for my Country, esteem for Horatius, affection and fidelity to Aronces, and innocence in all my actions. In the mean time the Consuls and the Senate were in a very great perplexity; for what course soever they could take, all things necessary for the subsistence of the people became so dear, that this farther increas'd the repinings of the multitude. The Enemies who were advertis'd of this disorder, taking advantage of it, freightned the City more than before, so that nothing at all enter'd into it. They dar'd not so much as drive the little remainder of Cattle in Rome, out of the walls of the City to feed; and all the Inhabitants were in extreme desperation. All sorts of divertisements were laid aside, even Lovers scarce spoke any longer love to their Mistresses; conversation was alike every where; and Amilcar and Anacreon who could not live without joy, profess'd they were more likely to dy of discontent than famine, if the state of things did not suddenly change. Nothing was seen every day but Funerals, either of those that had been wounded in the late fight, or whom the necessity of Fate cut off. There was a mortal paleness in most faces, and the fear of famine anticipating sad effects, caus'd the people to believe they suffer'd the misery already which they did but apprehend. Things being in this condition, that which more exasperated the peoples minds was, that they understood the fierce and cruel Tullia was arriv'd in the Camp of Porfenna, and demanded to live at a Castle, near that wherein Galeria was, till the end of the siege. But Mutius who had long sought to signalize himself by some eminent service to his Country, and to compel Valeria to esteem him above his Rivals, went to wait upon her one morning; and saluting her with a countenance that discover'd he had some grand design in his mind, Suffer me, Madam, (said he to her) to take leave of you alone, and to reveal a secret to you of highest importance. I have long agoe known that the passion I have for you is displeasing to you, and that of four Lovers which adore you, at present Herminius is the only affected, Amilius the pity, Spirius the hate, and you are insensible towards me. Nevertheless, Madam, in spite of my unhappiness, I have taken a fancie to have a share in your compassion, since I can have none in your affection. Prepare your self therefore, Madam, to bestow a few tears upon me, when you shall understand my death: for I assure you, you have more interest than my Country in the Design which I have laid to deliver it. I cannot speak more clearly to you, time will inform you further, and let you know that bidding you adieu this day, I believe 'tis the last time I ever shall do so: but least your answer should weaken my resolution (added he) I chuse rather humbly to take leave without expecting it. And accordingly without giving her time to answer a word, he went forthwith to the Senate, having first intimated to the Consuls he had something of importance to acquaint them with. When he came before the Assembly, beginning to speak with a heroical stoutness and a firm voice, My Lords (said he) I come to desire two favours of you: the first, that you would permit me to goe out of the City disguised in a Tuscan habit; the other, that you would not require me to declare what way I intend to attempt the deliverance of Rome. Secrecie is so absolutely necessary to the execution of my design, that I ought not to impart it to a great Assembly; and withal I have so high an esteem of your vertue in general, that I conceive I should doe you injury, if I offer'd to select any particular person of the company with whom to intrust it. Let it suffice that I assure you it is great, and may prove happy; and moreover, that if I dye, I shall account my life very gloriously bestow'd, since I shall loose it in recovering Liberty to my Country. Mutius having done speaking, the Senate deliberated upon what he had said; and tho there was little probability to think a single man could effect the raising of the Siege, nevertheless matters were in so bad a condition, that knowing him for a person of illustrious extraction, high courage, very zealous for Liberty, of a resolute minde, and much affected with a powerful desire of glory, they granted him what he requested. Upon which without loss of time, that very evening he disguis'd himself like a plain Tuscan Soldier, and taking advantage of the darkest time of the night to pass out of the City into the Enemies Camp, went forth of Rome with a Ponyard hidden in his cloaths, none besides himself knowing the great design, which affection to his Country, and love of the vertuous daughter of Publicola had together excited him to. Mutius's Nurse having been a Tuscan-woman, he spoke Tuscan well enough not to fear being discover'd by his language. So he pass'd over over the Tyber at midnight, and was so fortunate as to arrive at Porfenna's Quarter without being stop'd. When he was there, he thrust himself into the company of a great number of Souldiers, whom he beheld gather'd together before a Tribunal rais'd only two steps high, upon which stood a man of good aspect, giving orders necessary for the pay of the Soldiers, and who seem'd to have all the marks of Royaltie; for he had a robe of purple on, and guards about him. Mutius approacht as neer him as he desir'd; for appearing to have no arms, and being clad in a Tuscan garb, no body had any distrust of him. So he approacht the Tribunal, and apprehending the person upon it was Porfenna, not daring to inquire for fear of being discover'd, and doubting he should not find another opportunity so favorable to his purpose, on a sudden considering this man as the Enemy of Rome, the Protector of Tarquin, and finally as a Prince whose death was necessary for the deliverance of his Country, in a moment he divides the prefs, draws his Ponyard, falls upon him, and sheaths it in his heart, with such speed, that it was not seen till he had drawn it all bloody out of the body of him whom he took for Porfenna. This desperate act so surpris'd all that beheld it, that he that committed it might perhaps have sav'd himself in spight of those that encompass'd him, if Porfenna coming at that time forth of his Tent, which was hard by, and understanding the matter, had not commanded his guards to bring the man before him either alive or dead. And accordingly, Mutius, tho he easily enough escap'd with his Ponyard in his hand out of the throng of the terrifi'd Soldiers who Beheld his fact, was constrain'd to yeild himself to be conducted before Porfenna by the guards he had sent to take him. This Prince was at that time before his Tent, where he beheld the preparations of a Sacrifice which he caus'd to be offer'd to the Gods every morning, and had standing about him Aronces, Telanus, Lucilius, Theanor, and diverse other persons of Quality. Mutius's Ponyard wherewith he had committed that bold act being wrested from him, he appar'd without arms before Porfenna, but with a countenance full of fierceness, that spoke his regret for having fail'd in his enterprise, but no fear of the death which he could not but believe was prepar'd for him. As soon as he was come before the King, the enraged Prince frowning upon him, Who are you? (said he to him) whence come you? tell me, who sent you? who put you upon this? who are your Complices? and whether your aim was only against him you have slain, or you intended to take away my life too? I am a Roman Citizen (answer'd he fiercely) my extraction is noble, I am call'd Mutius, and the action I have newly done may prove to you that I want not courage. Considering you as the most dangerous Enemy of Rome, I resolv'd to take away your life; but to the end you may not think your self safe, when you have put me to death, know, I am not the only person that has layd this design, but there are three hundred of us that have sworn your destruction, of whom I am the most inconsiderable in greatness of courage. The lot is fallen upon me first, but I hope some of the rest will be more fortunate than I have been, and that by your death all the Romans shall be reveng'd for the wrong you commit in protecting an infamous Tyrant. But wherefore (repli'd Porfenna) have not the three hundred Conspirators you speak of, rather desig'n'd to assassinate Tarquin than me? Because (answer'd Mutius) if the Tyrant were dead, your party would rather become stronger than weaker thereby; but if you were remov'd out of the world, Tarquin's party would be destroy'd. Porfenna being then more incens'd against Mutius, and desiring to know the names of those, he said, had conjur'd against his life, commanded his guards to compel him by force to discover what he desir'd to understand. But Mutius, to hinder them from executing his order, stept suddenly towards the fire that was prepar'd for the Sacrifice, and putting his hand into the midst of the flames, See (said he to him without changing his countenance) by the steadfastness I have to endure the rigour of the fire, how little they fear that ardently love glory, and judge by what I doe, whether I am likely to tell by force of torments what you desire to know of me. Mutius spoke this with so undaunted and bold an aspect, and beheld his hand burn with so calm a countenance, that Porfenna and all about him were so astonish'd with this action, that they express'd their amazement in shouts which they were unable to contain. Porfenna himself advanc'd towards Mutius, and commanded his guards to withdraw his hand out of the fire. That which you doe against your self (said the King to him then, beholding him with admiration) is far greater than what you desig'n'd to doe against me; and if I had a Subject that had done as much for my service, there is no reward so high, but the greatness of his courage ought to expect it from me. Yet it were more noble, my Lord, (answer'd Aronces) to esteem greatness of courage in the person of an enemy than of a Subject. I grant it (reply'd Porfenna) and to evidence to you that I am of that mind, I give Mutius his life. I thank you for it in his name, my Lord (answer'd Aronces generously) for he seems to me so fierce as not to care for having a good render'd to him which he was willing to loose; and I thank you in my own, for having given me so great an example to follow. 'Tis true, my Lord (said Mutius) life is very indifferent to me: but for that 'tis an obligation, that the King is pleas'd to give me a thing which he believes ought to be acceptable to me, I will testifie my gratitude to him, by telling him once again, that his life cannot be in safety unless he give peace to Rome, and desert the interest of Tarquin, who is too unjust to prosper long. For, in brief, I am the least courageous of the three hundred that have sworn his destruction. Ah! Mutius (cry'd Porfenna) if I am so hated by three hundred such brave men as you are, that they resolve to destroy my life, an Army of a hundred thousand men could not preserve it; and to testifie to you how highly I esteem your courage, I will adde liberty to the life which I have already granted you. Since that is a thousand times dearer to me than life (answer'd he) I thank you for it, my Lord: but I cannot dissemble my sentiments; know, that as great a benefit as it is, I cannot accept it, if it be on condition to cease being your Enemy, in case you continue to be one to Rome. For inasmuch as I can never cease to be a Romane, so I can never dispenfe with hating those that would subdue my Country. Therefore doe not grant me liberty, if you intend thereby to ingage me in your interests. For, 'tis certain (added he fiercely) I can never be absolv'd from the Oath I have made with those three hundred Romans, who have sworn your ruine. Porfenna being still more astonish'd at the boldness of Mutius, commanded he should be led into a Tent, that his hand should be dress'd, that he should be treated very well, and secur'd till further Order. After which Tarquin being arriv'd, express'd to Porfenna very much animosity against Mutius, and ask'd him what punishments he determin'd to inflict upon him. You ought rather to ask (answer'd Porfenna) what way I can secure my self from those three hundred resolute persons, who for your interests have conspir'd against my life onely. That which I speak, my Lord (reply'd Tarquin) agrees with what you say: for is there any other means to avoid the effect of that Conspiracie, but by striking a terror into the Complices by the dreadful punishments you shall cause Mutius to endure? But what can a man be made to suffer (said Porfenna) that comes in a manner to seek a certain death, that comes with a Ponyard onely, into the midst of an Army to kill me; that endures the fire without changing countenance, and will not accept either of life or liberty on condition to cease being my Enemy? Voluntary punishments (answer'd Tarquin) are no punishments at all: but if you force Mutius to suffer, you will see him change his language; especially if the torments you put him to, be long and often repeated. For when all is done (added the cruel Tyrant) fear is the surest guard of Kings in such cases. For my part (said Aronces, who could not endure Porfenna should hear the Tyrant's Counsels) I conceive that in stead of seeking which way the King may be secur'd from so many generous Enemies, it would be the best and surest course to seek the means to have no occasion to be secur'd from them. But how can that be? (said Tarquin roughly.) The matter would be very easie (answer'd Aronces generously) if the King would but make Friends of his Enemies. That Counsel (reply'd the Tyrant fiercely) must be extended further, and it should have been added also, that 'tis requisite for the King of Hetruria to make Enemies of his Friends. The Counsel of Aronces (said Porfenna, not permitting Tarquin to continue his discourse) is worthy of himself and of me; and when my friends betake themselves to consider only their own interests without considering mine, it will concern me a little if they become my Enemies; I shall then be more strong by having fastned generous Enemies to my Interests, than by losing self-ended Friends, who care only for their own. Aronces, Lucilius, Telanus, Theanor, and all the other Commanders that were present, having by a confus'd noise, testifi'd their approbation of what Porfenna spoke; Tarquin became extremely amaz'd and perplex'd: yet being a Prince whom Policie had taught to conform himself readily according to the most unexpected events, he made no long hesitation, but addressing to the King, My Lord (said he) to testifie to you that I have regarded only the preservation of your life, I without passion receive what you spoke last, and also advise you to clemencie, tho according to my judgement, that vertue ought to be practis'd but seldom, when a Prince intends to make himself fear'd and respected. Pardon Mutius therefore since you have such a desire, but doe not loose the opportunity of taking Rome, which it cannot avoid, if you will wait but a small time longer. It will not cost you the life of one of your Soldiers; famine is ready to destroy three hundred thousand men, and force them to yeild without conditions, or make a great bonfire of their City, to avoid falling into your power. Every one has his Maxims and his reasons (answered Porfenna) and the business is important enough to be con-sider'd of at leisure. In the mean time (added the Prince) 'tis best to cause the Sacrifice which is prepar'd to be offer'd to the Gods in thankfulness to them for my deliverance from the danger intended to me, and to ask Counsel of them, which they alone can give me. Tarquin durst not contradict Porfenna; but in stead of being present at the Sacrifice, he withdrew, and went to consult with the cruel Tullia what was fitting to be done. As soon as he was gone, Aronces causing all his Friends to be assistant, continued the King his Father in the generous sentiments he had possess'd him with: But for that this Prince was scrupulous to make an absolute resolution, he required two dayes to consider. In the mean time, by reason of those three hundred Romans Mutius spoke of, the Kings guard's were doubled, none were suffer'd to come neer his person without first knowing what they were; all that approacht him were searcht, for fear they might have Ponyards hidden about them, as Mutius had, and so great care was taken for the guarding of this Prince, that he judg'd this inquietude worse than death. In the evening he went to the Castle where Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines were, who understanding what had hapn'd, and desiring to incline him to peace, commended him much for having given Mutius his life, and caus'd him to be advis'd by his principal Ministers, to send to offer peace to Rome. At first he refus'd it, alledging, that having undertaken the Protection of Tarquin, honour would not suffer him to desert him; adding also, that it might be thought the fear of being assassinated had induc'd him to take this resolution, tho it was principally because the action of Mutius recalling into his memory all the great exploits that had been done since the War, by Brutus, Publicola, Herminius, Horatius, and all the other Romans, he began to know that Rome was protected by the Gods, and Tarquin abandon'd by them. Wherefore having some kind of remorse for having protected a Prince so unjust, against People of so eminent vertue, he would willingly have granted peace to Rome, if he had thought it consistent with his honour. His mind being thus dispos'd, he understood that Mutius's act render'd the valour of the Romans so formidable to his Soldiers, that forgetting the last advantage they obtain'd, a pannick fear seiz'd upon their minds in such sort, that at the least noise their Sentinels heard, they imagin'd they beheld the three hundred companions of Mutius coming to fall upon them. Porfenna understood at the same time, that Tarquin had drawn all his own Soldiers to his Quarter, which was on the other side the River; that he had had consultations with the fierce Tullia, that he had sent privily to the Cities of Ceres, Cume, and *Tarquini*a, and lastly, that Tullia was coming towards his Castle. Wherefore the proceeding of Tarquin incensing him further, he was easily brought to have such sentiments as Aronces desir'd he should. But for that Galerita fear'd the subtlety of Tullia, she took upon her self to receive her, whilst the King going another way return'd to the Camp. When that cruel Queen arriv'd, she was receiv'd by Galerita with the civility due to her condition. She seem'd surpris'd not finding the King there, with whom she desir'd to speak: but having a bold spirit, not easie to be daunted, she discours'd with Galerita as a person engag'd in her interests would have done. She conjur'd her to hinder Porfenna from deserting the Siege of Rome; for in fine (said she to her) should Porfenna desire to keep his Conquest, I should

consent to it, and engage my self to cause Tarquin to consent also: there being nothing which I would not rather chuse, than to see Rome in liberty. But whereas it may be (added she) that the King of Hetruria desires not to usurp the State of a Prince, whose Protection he hath undertaken; when Rome shall be taken, I offer to take my Daughter from Mamilius, and to give her to Aronces, and afterwards to bring it about, that Sextus shall be contented to Reign in Tarquiniæ. For my part, Madam, (answer'd Galerita) I have nothing to say to the proposals you make to me, but only that 'tis easie for you to judge that the Romans will never suffer Tarquin to be King of Rome, that 'tis absolutely impossible to establish him, by reason of the horrible hatred they bear against him; and consequently Porfenna being unable to make war advantageously for Tarquin, may make peace honourably for him. Nevertheless, I know (added this wise Princess) the King will make what instance he can in favour of your interests: but however I am of opinion, it is not to cause the destruction of a great City and of a great Army, for a thing that is well known can never be brought to pass; especially (continu'd the Princess) when it is attempted in behalf of a Prince who considers only his own grandeur, and takes no care for the interests of those that hazard all for his. Tullia had much ado to restrain from returning Galerita a sharp answer; but for that she would not make an absolute breach, to the end she might have more opportunity to prejudice Aronces and Clelia, she dissembled her resentment, and told the Queen that it was necessary for her to go and satisfy the King of Hetruria, that he should not think strange that Tarquin staid at his Quarters till he had made his resolutions, for fear lest his Enemies should induce him as well to deliver him up to the Romans, as to abandon the siege of Rome. And so taking leave of Galerita, she went forthwith to the Princess of the Leontines, and handsomely intimated to her, that if she could bring it so to pass, that Porfenna took Rome and re-established Tarquin, she would cause her to be married to Prince Titus; after which she returned to her Chariot. Which she had no sooner done, but she was informed that the Souldiers that saw her pass along murmur'd openly in the Camp, because their courage was employ'd to replace a Woman upon the Throne, who had driven her Chariot over the body of her Father, and who ought rather to think of rendering an account to the Gods of all her crimes, than Reigning in a City where so many brave people were. This plain advice, which she receiv'd by the Captain of her Guards, caus'd her to change her resolution. So that instead of going to find Porfenna, she return'd to Tarquin's quarter, and endeavour'd to persuade him to surprise the Kings of Hetruria's Camp by night; or since he could not take Rome, to employ some correspondents she had in the City to set it on fire. In the mean time the proceedings of Tarquin having exasperated Porfenna, the siege being not likely to go on well longer between two divided Camps, and Mutius's courage, together with Aronces's counsel having prevail'd upon the heart of the King of Hetruria, he sent Mutius back again to Rome by Lucilius, who had order to offer the Romans peace upon reasonable conditions. Tellanus also accompani'd Lucilius to negotiate this grand affair. Their instructions were; first to demand once more the restoration of Tarquin, yet without much insisting upon an Article which was known could never be granted: Secondly to obtain at least, that all he had by Succession from the first Tarquin, and all he had gotten since, should be deliver'd to him; and thirdly that a small Territory near the Veientes should be restor'd to Porfenna, the Romans having usurpt it from him ever since the last War. Upon these Conditions they were to offer up the Janiculum, and withdraw the Army out of the Roman Territories. Moreover, to the end all acts of hostility might sooner cease, he enjoin'd the Ambassadors to demand twenty Virgins of Quality for Hostages, and twenty Youths of Condition, till the perfect conclusion of the peace: refusing absolutely to yield up the Janiculum or withdraw his Army without this condition. Lucilius and Tellanus being well instructed what they should do, departed with Mutius, whose heart was possess'd with extream joy to see his design so happily succeed, and that his Lie was as serviceable to the deliverance of Rome as his valour: for it was not true, that three hundred Romans had sworn the death of Porfenna, and he spoke in this manner only to induce the King to raise his Siege. As for Aronces he was so joyful with the hope of seeing Peace, that he could not contain from going to declare it to the Princess of the Leontines, and the generous Melintha. He was also much pleas'd that he could send that old Man to Rome, whom Galerita promis'd him to procure deliver'd, and Plotina so ardently wish'd to see, to the end she might learn her extraction, of which she was still ignorant. Wherefore to make use of this favourable opportunity of giving Clelia intelligence of himself, he writ to her by Tellanus, and to Artemidorus, Herminius and Oclavius, and several other friends, to oblige them to be diligent in promoting the peace. When Lucilius and Tellanus approacht the Walls, and the people beheld them coming with Palms in their hands to signify their bringing Propositions of Peace, they sent forth shouts of joy, they run hastily to the gate at which they were to enter, and express'd such earnestness to know what they had to say, that 'twas easie to judge they would be favourably heard. So they were immediately conducted before the Senate, to whom Lucilius presented Mutius; after which, relating in few words what had pass'd, and had handsomely magnifi'd Porfenna's generosity, who was capable not only to give life and liberty to a man that had resolv'd upon his death, but also to send to offer peace at a time when he might hope a happy event of the War; he dextrously dispos'd the minds of the Senators to hear the Propositions he had to make. Yet he was stop't at the first Article which he spoke of the re-establishment of Tarquin, and the Senate all with one voice said that death being eligible before servitude, no peace was to be hop'd, if it could not be made otherwise. Whereupon Lucilius having order not to insist upon that Article, he said that according to his instructions, that at least it was fit to restore the Tarquins what belong'd to them as ordinary Citizens; so that this qualification calming their minds they agreed the restitution of what could be yet found had belong'd to them, not as if justice requir'd it, but only in consideration that Porfenna had restor'd Mutius. After which Lucilius demanded that a small compass of Territory which had been usurp'd from Porfenna's Dominions should be restor'd to him; that twenty Virgins of Quality, and twenty youths of condition should be deliver'd to him in hostage; and told them then, that his Matter would withdraw his Forces out of Janiculum, open the passages, free the River, and cause all acts of hostility to cease, without ingaging more in the affairs of Tarquin. Lucilius having lay'd open his King's demands, did not long withdraw, but all those that compos'd the Senate unanimously declar'd, they found no difficulty in granting what Porfenna required. Yet there were some that scrupled the Article concerning Hostages; but Porfenna understanding how important that peace was, and that they who stuck at it could not but have some secret inclination for Tarquin (because having no children themselves, they were unconcern'd in this Article) he oppos'd his judgments. No, no, (said he hastily) we ought not to stick at a just thing; for it is equitable that Porfenna, restoring the Janiculum before the final execution of the Treaty that is to be made, have Hostages for security; and it is not to be fear'd, that a Prince who sends back an Enemy whom he might with justice retain, will keep back Hostages, which he cannot withhold without violating the Publick-Faith. But how is it intended (answer'd a Senator roughly that was on the contrary opinion) that those twenty Virgins of Quality shall be chosen out? To testify to the Publick (reply'd Publicola) that I have no intention to except my own daughter from the general rule, and that all that is mine is the commonwealth's, my advice is, that the choice be made by order of Lot without any deceit, and that all the names of Youths of Quality in general be put into one Urne, and those of Virgins of condition in another; and that in the middle of the Temple of Janus, which ought to be shut up as soon as these Hostages shall be delivered, a young Child shall draw twenty of these Tickets which shall be well mingled before hand, after which without any contest they whose names shall be found in the twenty Tickets, to be sent to Porfenna. Publicola's opinion seeming just and generous, they who had offered to obstruct the peace, durst not contradict it. But before they broke up, the Senate Voted to give Mutius the Meadow in which he had done that great action of enduring the fire with such extraordinary constancy. And accordingly that peice of Land was from that time called, The Mutian-Meadows; and he himself was term'd Mutius Scvola by reason of his burnt hand. After this result had been taken, it was signifi'd to Lucilius and Telanus, who nevertheless could not return till the day following, because the Senate would not absolutely conclude the business without the suffrages of the people. 'Tis true, it was easie to judge they would approve the deliberations that were made, for they had suffered far more than those of the better Quality. Telanus after he came out of the Senate delivered Arnce's Letters to Clelia, and the rest he writ to; he intended also to carry the old man who accompanied him to Plotina; but he requested him to leave him at Clelius's house. However Telanus desir'd at least to signify to that fair Virgin, of whom he was still amorous, that Arnce's had kept his word which he had pass'd; and to that purpose he went to wait upon her, where he found good company; for Valeria, Berelisa, Anacreon, Amilcar, Herminius, Acrisius, and Spurius were with her, as also Ottavins and Horatius. The action of Mutius, and the Peace being two matters new and important, they were talk'd of alone in all companies, every one magnifying or diminishing the merit of Mutius's act, according to their own judgements or inclinations. For that Telanus was esteem'd by all the World, he was received with joy; he was askt tidings concerning Arnce's, he was thanked for the peace

as if he had made it, and a thousand caresses were made to him. For my part (said Plotina pleasantly) I believe Berelisa, Clidamira and my self see Telanus again with more joy than Valeria; for being they are not of Rome, and I think my self no Roman, (tho I know not precisely what I am) we are not in the same fear that she is of going as Hostage to Porfenna's Camp. That which you do not fear (answer'd Telanus) is that which discontents me; for I should be sufficiently joyful that you were in a place where I could render you any service. 'Tis true (said Valeria with a melancholy aspect) my joy for the peace is not absolutely pure, and fear left the Lot fall upon me, sufficiently disturbs me. Confess the truth (said Berelisa to her with a low voice) 'tis not that alone that causes the sadness in your eyes; but your fear lest Mutius's action which produces peace to Rome, cause Publicola to change his mind, and be prejudicial to Herminius, occasions your discontent. 'Tis true (reply'd Valeria blushing) my Father is so accustomed to Sacrifice all things to the Publick-good, that I cannot but fear becoming one of the Victims of the Peace. Whilst Berelisa and Valeria were speaking low, Plotina not being able to contain from turning the most serious matters to railery: for my part (said she) I confess I have at present the greatest ardency in the world to know who were the three hundred men which 'tis said Mutius affirmed had conspir'd to kill Porfenna. I know at least I am none of them (answer'd Herminius). I should be very sorry to be suspected for one (added Horatius) I am of your mind (pursu'd Ottavins.) Anacreon and I (said Amilcar) being not born at Rome, we have no concernment in it, since Mutius said they were three hundred young Romans who had conspir'd against Porfenna's life. As for me (said Spurius) whereas Mutius and I have not the same intimacy as heretofore, it cannot be believ'd that he communicated his design to me. And for my part (added Acrisius) I have several reasons for which I cannot be accus'd for one; as first, I was not born in Rome: Secondly, ——— Oh! I beseech you (interrupted Plotina laughing, and knowing how much Acrisius affected to speak) stop there, for I hate nothing more than those people who in a great company where every one has right to say something, begin to speak with First, and to proceed to Secondly, and Thirdly, and I am ready to dye with fear, lest they should go on till they come to Fiftiethly. All the company laughing at the manner in which Plotina interrupted Acrisius, he was a little abashed; but yet he was constrained to bear the railery whether he would or no, for fear of offending Plotina, of whom he was highly enamoured. However, this fair Virgin that he might not give him leisure to be angry, chang'd the discourse, and beholding all those that had spoken, But according as you all speak (said she) it might seem an injury to you to accuse you of being any of those three hundred Conspirators. To save you the trouble of searching for so great a number of them (said Telanus then) I shall assure you I believe Mutius was the sole person, and made use of that untruth to induce Porfenna to what he desir'd; for by the way as he came hither, he spoke certain things which suffer me not to doubt of it at all. If it be so said (Plotina) I think this unhappy adventure ought to reconcile Herminius to lying. 'Tis so far from it (answer'd he) that I shall hate it the more, for tho I am zealous for my Country, yet I confess I should not like to deliver deliver it either by a Lye or an Assassination; and if I were to chuse either Horatius's action or that of Mutius, I should not deliberate a moment, notwithstanding the success of the last is far more considerable than of the former. But that it may not be thought I speak as a Rival or as an envious person, I shall commend Mutius for the constancy where-with he endur'd the torment of the flames that burnt his hand, and for his courage in attempting a thing in which it is probable he would perish: but as for the Lye and Assassination, I confess to you, I cannot find any thing in them that does not clash with my inclination. For according to my judgement, to do an action perfectly Heroical, not only the motive to it ought to be just, but likewise the means noble and innocent. Indeed (added Valeria) suppose an indifferent cause in the action of Mutius, he will be the greatest Criminal of all mankind, and the most inconsiderate; and he cannot be commended saving for a happy rashness. Should you speak this at present in the Court of the Capitol (answer'd Plotina) the people would look upon you as an Enemy of Rome. Nevertheless Valeria has reason (reply'd Octavius). But however (said Amilcar) 'tis good there be Heroes of all sorts, that is, such as are scrupulous scarce of any thing, rash and Liers; for in brief, without Mutius you had had no peace: wherefore I conclude, that the Lye he made use of, be put in the rank of those innocent Lies of which we spoke so much here one day. It will be enough (answer'd Hermianus) to put it in the rank of happy Lies. In truth (said Plotina then) I perceive there are scarce any pleasures how great soever, but are mix'd with some sorrow. Peace which is so great a good, perhaps will shortly cause several displeasures to me: for I apprehend Berulisa, Clidamira, and Anacreon will speedily go from us: and besides, I am in great fear lest the Lot which is to appoint those twenty Virgins of Quality that are to be given in Hostage, should cruelly deprive me of all those I love best. As Plotina had done speaking, Clelia enter'd, who came to seek Valeria there. A little while after Cesonia brought Clelius into Plotina's chamber, with the same old man whom she had seen once before, and who was to inform her of her true extraction. As soon as she beheld him, she chang'd colour, out of fear it might be less honourable than she imagin'd. But she was not long in this uncertainty: for Clelius in the midst of the company embrac'd her very affectionately, and presenting her to Horatius, You know, generous Horatius (said he to him) I have treated you as one resolv'd to give you my daughter at the end of the War, but in the mean time before I make that promise good, I must give you a sister, who is a person unquestionably worthy of that Relation. Receive therefore Plotina as a generous Brother ought to receive her. But Moreover (added he, turning towards Clelia) I must give my daughter as well as Horatius a sister; and therefore (proceeded he, directing his speech to Clelia) embrace Plotina as a person united to you by blood: and you, Octavius (added he) do the same. The discourse of Clelius so amaz'd all the Company, and chiefly Clelia, Horatius, Octavius, and Plotina, that they beheld one another silently, without making the civilities to one another which this discovery requir'd. But at length Plotina began to speak, and addressing to Clelius, It is so little advantageous to you, my Lord (said she) to give such a person as I am, sister to Cle- lia, that I doubt not you are my Father, since you profess it your self: but I confess I do not apprehend how I can be sister both to Horatius and Clelia. Since 'tis a thing which must become publick (reply'd Clelius) it is not unfit to begin the publishing of it before such a Company as this is. For my part (said Horatius) I am so impatient to know how it comes that I have the happiness to be Plotina's Brother, and brother to a daughter of Clelius, and a sister of Clelia, that you cannot more sensibly oblige me than by declaring to me what I vehemently desire to understand. Know then (answer'd Clelius) that you were son of a woman of very great wit and virtue, for whom I had almost from my childhood the most respectful affection that ever was, and whose memory is still extreme dear to me. You know the lost her Husband during her banishment; that I was exil'd as well as she, that I have been so thrice in my life by the cruel Tarquin. During this banishment I became more charm'd with her constancy; and whereas melancholy had rendred her health very infirm, she fear'd to leave you without a careful guardian. Wherefore this consideration rather than that of the affection I had for her, oblig'd her to marry me secretly, as you may know of an ancient Priest still living, who is at present here amongst the Salians; for you were not then with her. Our marriage was thought fit to be conceal'd, because if Tarquin had known it, it had been impossible for us to hope ever to return to Rome, since hating us severally, he would have hated us more if he had understood our interests were united. During this secret Marriage, and whilst we were at Ardea, Plotina came into the world, and we conceal'd her birth. But eight daies after, her mother and yours dy'd; and this prudent old man whom you see, being our intimate Friend, took care of Plotina, whom he caus'd for some time after to pass for his own daughter, and that easily enough; because having one near of the same age that dy'd in the Country, he conceal'd her death, and substituted Plotina in her stead, without my knowing any thing of it, because I continued not long in that place. Your Mother before her death writ a scroll with her own hand that she left a daughter, and oblig'd me to deliver that writing to the Grand Vestal, who dy'd some daies since, and was her intimate friend, to the end it might remain in her hands as an indubitable testimony of the birth of Plotina. Shortly after I was oblig'd to depart from Ardea, and came back to Rome, where for the interest of my affairs I married Sulpicia; since which, you know I was compell'd to fly and go seek a Sanctuary at Carthage. At my departure I writ to that Friend I had at Ardea, but I had no answer from him. When I return'd, I inquir'd of him, and was inform'd it was not known what was become of him since the War Tarquin made against the Tuscan. I understood indeed he left a daughter, but for that it was after my departure that his dy'd, I did not imagine it was mine. Nevertheless the Gods have been pleas'd that this prudent old man whom you behold, became first a prisoner of War, and afterwards a prisoner of State for a great many years, without being known where he was: and the same Gods have permitted that by Aruncus's means he understood tidings of me, came hither first with that Prince, and has at length been set at liberty by his procurement, to come and oblige the wife Octavia, who is at this day chief of the Vestals, to cause the writing to be sought out which was entrusted with her predecessor, who at her death intended intended certainly to speak concerning Plotina when she began to declare a thing which she did not finish, as all the world knows. Thus there is no doubt but Plotina is your sister; you know your Mothers writing, since you cannot but have many things by you written by her hand. The quality and vertue of him that brought up Plotina is not unknown to any, and I conceive you are sufficiently perswaded of my honesty not to doubt of what I say. In the meantime I declare to you, I do not intend Plotina should diminish any thing of your estate, I charge my self with her portion; and this sage old man before you, desirous not to cease altogether to be her father, tells me, he gives her all he has. Clelius spoke this with an air that took away all ground to doubt of what he said; and moreover Horatius was so joyful to find he had a sister that was able to do him good offices with Clelia, that he was wholly dispos'd to believe himself her brother. Plotina was also very much satisfied to understand she was a Roman, daughter of Clelius, and sister of Octavius and Clelia. Not but that I could have wish'd (said she, smiling) I had not understood this till four daies hence, to the end my name might not be put amongst those which are to be drawn by Lot to give Hostages to Porfenna. The case is now otherwise, daughter (answer'd Clelius) and it concerns you it were not; but I hope the Gods will exempt you from that trouble, as well as Clelia, who I ardently wish prove not one of the number of the Hostages. After this, Octavius made a complement to Plotina, Clelia did the same, and, in brief, all congratulated her for the discovery. Amilcar in particular us'd a thousand pleasant expressions to her, whilst Clelius and the old man of Ardea drawing Horatius aside, shew'd him his Mothers Letter to the Grand Vestal, and so manifested the business to him, that he could not doubt of so advantageous a truth. Indeed he did no longer doubt at all, but that now he had cause to redouble his hopes. The end of the War was near, he knew Porfenna had not changed his mind concerning Aronces's love; he understood Clelius was already his Father-in-law, that he had a sister who was an intimate friend to Clelia, and was sister also to that fair Virgin as well as to himself. Wherefore he abandon'd his heart to joy, and testin'd it both by his actions and words. As for Clelia tho she had a great affection for Plotina, yet she was inwardly troubled at this adventure; because she perceived Horatius had still more power in the mind of Clelius, and fear'd lest knowing her self sister to Horatius, she should engage in his interest. But that lovely Virgin made not that use of her affinity; but on the contrary observing part of Clelia's thoughts in her eyes, she handsomely separated her from the rest of the Company, and embracing her with tenderness, I beseech you, my dear sister (said she with a low voice) do not look coldly upon me as a sister of Horatius that intends to undertake his interests against you; for I declare to you, that by becoming his sister, I do not cease to be Aronces's friend, and that I will not employ the right given me by nature of speaking freely to him, onely to tell him that since he cannot be lov'd by you, he ought not to seek his own happiness with the prejudice of yours; and I engage my self also to tell my Father whatever you dare not. And now after this, love me as before, and if possible a little more. I had long since so great an affection for you (answer'd Clelia) that it would be hard for me to augment it: but after what you have said, I assure you, my dear sister, that if I cannot add to my affection, I will encrease my esteem, and will serve you in reference to Sulpicia as ardently as you shall me in respect of Horatius. As Clelia ended these words, Horatius approacht the two fair Virgins, and looking upon Plotina, Well my dear sister (said he to her) will you not assist me to overcome the obstinate constancy of Clelia? No, brother (answer'd she) but to give you the Counsel of a good sister, I will advise you to endeavour to overcome your self. She would have proceeded, but Amilcar imagining he should do a pleasure both to Clelia and Plotina by insinuating himself into the conversation of Horatius, went to them, and so did Anacreon; whilst Clelius was manifesting to Cesonia, Berelisa, and Clidamira the adventure he had related. Plotina not having chang'd her humour with her condition, smil'd after having mus'd a little while, and addressing to Clelia, I assure you (said she to her) I gain an advantage this day above you, which I much fear will be much disadvantageous to me in Amilcar's opinion: for at the same time I know I am your elder sister, as being of the first Marriage; I also learn that I am at least four or five years older than I thought my looking-glass intimated to me, and I almost believ'd it, that I was only nineteen years of age; but I conceive by what Clelius has related, I am twenty four. Oh! amiable Plotina (answer'd Amilcar) you will never be above seventeen to me; for as long as a woman pleases me I account her young. And on the contrary, I know some Virgins of fifteen years, who seem to me above an Age old, because they do not please me. Moreover, to speak the truth of things, twenty four years are oftentimes the age of perfect beauty, and in which reason and beauty may most frequently be found together: for usually when reason comes, beauty departs: but at that time they are exactly together. Nevertheless, there is no general rule; for some women are more beautiful in the midst of their lives than in the prime of their youth; others too, more fools at the end of their daies than at the beginning of their lives; and there are some in whom reason is found from their very Childhood. For my part (said Plotina.) I am of this latter sort, and I do not remember that I ever was without reason: for from my tenderest youth, I knew I should one day be no longer young. I know above a hundred women (said Amilcar) that are not of your mind. You have reason (reply'd she) but I wonder all the fair ones do not foresee the end of their beauty. Yet I know some as well as you, that believe they shall never be above eighteen as long as they live; altho 'tis easie enough to judge time passes away very swiftly. Methinks, 'tis but a moment since I was a child; and if I should consider the future in the same manner as I do the time pass'd, I should think I should soon cease to be young. Believe me, amiable Plotina (said Amilcar) the pass'd and the future are not alike regarded. But how can that be which you say? (demanded Plotina) We see things pass'd clearly (answer'd Amilcar) but there is so great obscurity in the future, that the imagination not being able to penetrate into it, deceives it self, and believes that that which it does not see, is very remote; so that whereas people always love to beguile themselves to their own advantage, they look upon old age as so remote, and flatter themselves so pleasingly, that they do not fear even the things which must undoubtedly happen. That which further has perswaded me (reply'd Plotina)

aa) that I had use of Reason betimes, is, that from my first youth I extremely hated sadness, and lov'd every thing that was capable to please me. That sentiment is so natural (said Clelia) that I conceive you ought not to boast of it, and on the contrary I apprehend it to be the practice of reason oftentimes to accustom oneself to sadness, and to refuse delightful things. If what you say be true (answer'd Plotina) I shall never be wife as long as I live; for I cannot much refuse that which pleases me, nor accustom myself to that which does not. After this Clelius calling Clelia commanded her to go and prepare Suspicia to receive her Sister, assuring her he had acquainted her with the matter before he came. Then he requested Cesonia that she would please to lead Plotina to his house; and accordingly that amiable Lady accompani'd with Berelisa, Clidamira, and Plotina, and conducted by Clelius, went to Suspicia's house, where Clelia was arriv'd before. But altho Suspicia very much respected her husband, and esteem'd Plotina infinitely, and altho Clelia had inform'd her of the generous and noble mind of this fair Virgin: yet it was easie to observe that she had a secret regret in the bottom of her heart, to see that Clelius had heretofore married a Person whom she hated, and had a daughter by her. Nevertheless she receiv'd very civilly all that Plotina spoke at her arrival at her house, and this interview pass'd as it ought among persons of honour and prudence. Moreover, he that had been instrumental to the owning of Plotina, continu'd also at Clelius's house, who to testify more favour to Horatius, took Plotina by the hand, and beholding Clelia with authority in his countenance, 'Tis your part now (said he to Plotina) to promote the happiness of your brother, and to induce your sister to obey me willingly when the Peace shall be concluded. After which he left these two fair Virgins, without giving them leave to answer. The next morning the people being assembled confirm'd the Senates Votes with a thousand acclamations: which gave Lucilius and Telanus all the contentment they could desire. The people also would not consent that both of them should return to Porfenna, and therefore it was resolv'd that Lucilius should go to the Camp, and Telanus should stay at Rome to be present at the choice which was to be made of the Hostages by Lot. The multitude, on which the hardship of the Siege had fallen, being impatient to see the passages open, and the Janiculum restor'd into the power of the Romans, according to the conclusion of the Treaty, there was necessity of making haste, for fear of some sedition. Wherefore the Consuls caus'd notice to be given to all women of quality to bring their Daughters to the Temple of Janus. Things standing thus, Horatius being led by his passion, and forgetting what he one day promis'd Clelia, went to visit her Father, and addressing to him, My Lord (said he) I come to make a Proposal to you, which I know indeed contains something that may displease you; but being I act for your interest, and the quiet of my whole life, you ought to pardon me. You know (added he) that you have promis'd Clelia to me at the end of the War; and that lots are to be drawn for the Hostages which Porfenna demands. Now if it pleases fortune to chuse Clelia, she will not be long in your power, since the little Territory which is to be render'd to the King of Hetruria will not be soon restor'd; for besides that such like Articles are never perform'd speedily, Policy also requires, that Porfenna's party be not strengthened till Tarquin be absolutely discarded by him. Therefore, my Lord, to prevent Clelia's going to a place whither you would be sorry she should goe, cause her to change her condition; for if I marry her to day, she will not be to morrow expos'd to the inconvenience of the Lot, since it concerns only Virgins, and wives are exempted from it. I wish with all my heart (answer'd Clelius) I could grant that which you desire; but I cannot do it with honour: for it would clearly appear that I hastned the match on purpose not to expose my daughter to the hazard of being given in Hostage; which were unworthy of a true Roman. But hoping I shall be more happy than to become oblig'd to let her goe into Porfenna's hands, I promise to make her your wife as soon as the Treaty shall be accomplished. And so let us speak no more of this matter; for I will not be liable to the reproach of intending to effect an especial privilege to my self to exempt my daughter from a troublesome chance in which all others of her condition are concern'd. In fine, the business was perform'd the very next morning, and some Roman Ladies desirous out of generosity to testify their willingness to sacrifice all for their Country, brought their daughters thither to the Temple of Janus, for fear of being suspected of intending to exempt them from this ceremony. The generous Kacilia led thither the fair Hermilia her niece, whose countenance express'd all the grief she resent'd for the death of her illustrious brother and her Lover; and her sorrow renewing more in this occasion, appear'd so affecting an object, that it touch'd the hearts of all that beheld her. Indeed she was not the only person that appear'd sad; for the Lot being promiscuously contingent to all, there was none but fear'd it might fall upon her self, and accounted it a hard fate to goe to the Camp. Clelia, for her part, was not a little apprehensive of being under Porfenna's power, Valeria fear'd to be remov'd from Horatius, Plotina to leave Rome, and her Friend, and all in general, to goe alone into the hands of an Enemy Prince. But all these fair Victims being at length ranked in the middle of the Temple of Janus, which was enlightned with a hundred magnificent Lamps, the Grand Vestal came, follow'd with three of her companions to render the ceremony more solemn, and that with such majesty and grace, that she drew the eyes of the whole Assembly upon her. The Consuls plac'd themselves beneath her in this place. But Clelia transcended all the other fair ones in beauty; Valeria, tho less fair, yet did not seem much less amiable; Hermilia, notwithstanding her sadness, wholly gain'd the heart of Octavius; Coletania also appear'd very fair to all that beheld her, and Plotina with her free, natural, and pleasant aspect and the amiable freshness of her countenance, augmented the love of Amilcar, Telanus, Acrisius, and Damon too, who presently departed. Valeria likewise increased the passion of Herminius, Emilius, Spirius, and Mutius.

But to be brief, the Priest having taken the names of all the Virgins of Quality, whose number was very great, put them into a large Urn, and having mingled them together, plac'd it at the foot of the Altar: after which offering a Sacrifice only of Incense and Flowers, the Grand Vestal in the name of all the fair Virgins tender'd their acquiescenceto the Gods, to the end that all submitting themselves to the Orders of Lot, all might have a share in the merit of the action, and in the Liberty of Rome. Octavia perform'd this with so noble an air, that she excited the

the admiration of all the Spectators. This being done, a young childe approaching to the Urne wherein all the names were confusedly mingled, drew forth twenty of them one after another. The first was that of Plotina, who seem'd not to be discover'd for a Romane, but only that she might be presently given in Hostage. The second was of a sister of Flavia; the third of a niece of Spurius, who was very fair; the fourth of Hermilia, who could not hear her self nam'd without tears in her eyes; the fifth, of Valeria, who blusht when she heard her name; the sixth, of a daughter of the second Consul; the seventh, of Colatina; the eighth, of a Cousin of Solomina; and the ninth, of a niece of Clelius. After this ten more were drawn. So that there remaining onely one more to be drawn, it was thought Clelia would have escap'd. But at length the twentieth Ticket being drawn and open'd, Clelia's name was found in it. Clelius was very much troubled at it, but he conceal'd his discontent; which Horatius was not able to doe, but it was apparent enough in his eyes that he was extremely afflicted for Clelia's going to Porfenna's Camp, because he fear'd her vertue would mollifie the King's mind; or if it did not, she would not be well treated. Othavius's heart was mov'd to see Hermilia, so afflicted as she was, go into a Victorious Army which would alwayes bring into her memory the death both of her Brother and her Lover. As for Mutius, he was not very sorry that Valeria was to goe to Porfenna, by whom he hop'd to be protected, tho he had intended an attempt upon his life; but Herminius and Æmilius were so afflicted at it, that their sorrow serv'd to comfort Spurius for that grief he would have resent'd if he had been ignorant of their affliction. As for Amilcar, perceiving no very great sadness in Plotina's eyes, and being free to see her in Porfenna's Camp as well as at Rome, he thought to himself this change of life would give him a new affection without being oblig'd to change his Mistress. Telanus was very glad of this adventure; but Acrisius, Sicinius, and Damon much afflicted. As for Clelia, she did not certainly know what sentiments she ought to have: by reason of her natural modesty she could not but regret at her going to Porfenna's Camp; but otherwise her interests were so intricate, that she could not well disintangle them. She was not sorry to be remov'd from Horatius, and glad to think she should see Aronces: but she was to leave Sulpicia, and goe into the power of Porfenna, with whom she conceiv'd Tarquin and Sextus were not likely to make a total breach, and who she knew well did not approve the love Aronces had for her. Yet it was a consolation to her to have Valeria, Plotina, and Hermilia for her companions: but for all this, she was very sad as well as the rest of her Friends. All the influence the Publick interest had in the minds of these fair Virgins, only caus'd them to constrain themselves as much as they could, that they might not seem much afflicted for a thing that conduc'd to confirm the peace. As soon as their names were drawn, crowns of flowers were put upon their heads, and they were oblig'd to thank the Gods for chusing them to establish the liberty of Rome. Moreover, the names of twenty young youths of Quality were drawn by Lots; after which it was resolv'd to send the Hostages as soon as Lucilius was return'd, and Porfenna had confirm'd the Articles of Peace carry'd to him; and every one departed home. Then the fair Virgins prepared for their departure, and receiv'd the Adieus of their Lovers and Friends of both Sexes. Horatius express'd himself to Clelia in the most pathetical words the most violent love could dictate, and the most nice jealousy suggest to him. Mutius spok to Valeria with more fierceness than ordinary, and like a man that thought nothing could be refus'd him after having procur'd peace to Rome. I know well, cruel Valeria (said he to her) that you look upon what I have done for Rome, as if I had done it against you; but perhaps you will change your thoughts during your absence; in the mean time you must permit me to hope that Publicola, who is more sensible of the Publick-good than you, will thank me for what I have done for it, and be unwilling you should render me miserable. If my Father could render you happy (answer'd she) without violating his own word, and forcing my will, without doubt he would doe it; and were it in my power to hinder you from being miserable, I would doe it out of gratitude. But, Mutius, you require a thing absolutely impossible, therefore preserve no ill-grounded hope in your breast; Herminius is the only man in the world that I can love; and if I could cease to be his, I ought then to favour Æmilius, and not you. Ah! cruel Valeria (cry'd Mutius) consider what the Lover you despise is capable of doing, and fear lest he act that against his own Enemies which he has done against the Enemies of Rome. As you pretend to have perform'd a brave action (answer'd she) so there is reason to believe you will not blemish it by an ignoble one; and besides, to tell you freely, threatnings never cause any fear in me. You intend then (added he) that I must dye with despair, and burn eternally without hoping a moment of release in my torments. You can endure the fire so constantly (reply'd she with a little too sharp raillery) that you are less to be pity'd than another. But, in brief, Mutius (added she) content your self with the glory you have acquired, doe not blemish it with unjust menaces, addict your self rather to ambition than love, and leave me in quiet. I shall obey you, Madam (said he to her) and if I cannot leave you in quiet as you desire, I shall employ the same hand against my self that has lately given peace to Rome. Since I am alwayes alike equitable (answer'd Valeria) I oppose that which you intend to doe against your self, as I would oppose that which you should offer to attempt against another. No, no, Madam (said he to her) I have nothing to doe with your equity; and when the fancie takes me, I shall know well how to doe my self justice. In this manner Mutius parted from Valeria. Æmilius bid her Adieu like an unhappy Lover that dar'd not hope any thing, Spurius like a man that never despair'd of any thing, but alwayes believ'd what could not be obtain'd by merit or force, might be by subtlety. As for Othavius, his farewell to Hermilia was so respectful a declaration of Love, that this fair Virgin, as sad as she was, could not be offended at it. Sicinius following his own humor, bid Plotina Adieu in two words; Acrisius on the contrary employ'd a thousand in saying almost nothing to her. Damon who knew of the Dialogue Amilcar made while he was sick, spok to her more against his Rival than of his own passion; and as for Amilcar, he told her he would conduct her to the Camp, and assist Telanus to convoy her. Colatina had no Lover at Rome whom she regretted, and so was not troubled to bid adieu to any but her friends. Berelisa and Clidamira were much afflicted to see all these fair persons depart depart, and so was Anacreon. Indeed Artemidorus's sickness most of all took up their care; they went to visit him very frequently, sometimes with Sulpicia, Berelisa, or Cesonia, but with this advantage to Berelisa, that the Prince notwithstanding his weakness, observed this fair Virgin was more troubled for his wounds than Clidamira. He perceiv'd her more sad and dejected, and beheld in the other more pretence than true sorrow.

Lucilius being at length return'd, and having brought back the confirmation of the Peace, notwithstanding the negotiations of Tarquin and Tullia to break it, preparation was made to send away the Hostages. Accordingly the next morning all the young Youths that were to be given in Hostage, were led to the foot of the Janiculum, and the twenty fair Virgins conducted by their relations were put into the hands of the Consuls, who having caus'd magnificent Chariots to be prepar'd for them, caus'd them to be convey'd by Horatius, Octavius, and Herminius with the Troops that accompani'd them to the foot of the Janiculum. By the way as they went, all the people made a thousand vows for their preservation; and being come to that place, Lucilius and Tellanus sent Porfenna's Orders to cause the passages to be quitted, and did the like to those that kept the Janiculum. Whereupon the forces that kept this place began to draw off towards the King of Hetruria's Camp, at the same time that those which follow'd Horatius, Octavius, and Herminius possess'd themselves of the Post which the other abandon'd. Then the twenty Youths and the twenty fair Virgins, being put under the power of Lucilius and Tellanus, began to march to a place where the Forces of Porfenna that relinquisht the Janiculum made a halt till these Hostages were arriv'd. Horatius separating himself from the Roman Troops, approacht to the Chariot wherein Clelia was; so did Herminius to that of Valeria, Octavius to that of Hermilia, and the other Lovers that follow'd, to the Chariots wherein the persons they lov'd were. But Amilcar follow'd Lucilius and Tellanus, and was alwaies near the Chariot of Clelia, wherein Plotina was. But for that there needed a good time for Porfenna's Forces to break up their Camp, and the Romans to take possession of the Post they deserted, all the Chariots wherein the Virgins were, stay'd in a Meadow at the head of those Troops, who put themselves in Battalia as they descended. In the mean time the fair Virgins discours'd together amongst themselves, or with Amilcar, who sometimes went to one and sometimes to another. They had purpos'd to be negligently enough attir'd, but they were enjoin'd to adorn themselves, to the end they might draw more respect, and be more fitting to be presented to the King of Hetruria, with whom it was not doubted but Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines would be, when they should be presented to him, so that they never seem'd more fair than now. Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina were in the same Chariot; Hermilia and Colatina in another, every one having follow'd their own inclination. Amilcar being near Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina, told them he had a great advantage in being an African at this time; for I may now accompany you throughout (said he) whereas, if I were a Roman, I durst not follow you this day, because the Roman gravity would not permit me to go into the Enemies Camp till matters were compleatly pacifi'd. But since I take special priviledges to my self wherever I am, I go boldly to Porfenna, as if I were an Hostage. In good earnest (answer'd Plotina) you are so more than you imagine; for to speak sincerely, as often as you give your heart to any fair one, 'tis alwaies on condition that she shall restore it to you. Ah! perverse Plotina (cry'd he) if you were as long in Porfenna's hands, as my heart shall be in yours, you would never return to Rome. I assure you, (said she to him) that tho I hope restitution will shortly be made to Porfenna of that little corner of Territory that has been heretofore usurp'd from him, and consequently the Treaty being accomplisht, he will soon remit us back to Rome, yet I would not swear your heart should not go out of my power before I go out of that of Porfenna. But however that be (continued she) 'tis not the thing in Question at present, and only tell me, whether you know a man on Horse-back whom I see coming here, who methinks has a very blockish aspect, and is follow'd by five or six others that appear not much wiser. Clelia and Valeria turning their heads on that side, perceiv'd it was the infamous Sextus, who led by his own inclination, which alwaies carri'd him where women were, came insolently from his Quarter to see who they were that Lot had chosen out. For tho Tarquin was much discontented with Porfenna, yet he did not manifest it, and forbore to break wholly with him, hoping alwaies something would happen to disturb the Peace. As soon as Clelia and Valeria knew Sextus, they gave a great shriek, and turn'd away their eyes. But Tellanus who was in the head of the Forces, whil't Lucilius gave Orders in other places, encouraged them a little, judging it was not in Sextus's power to attempt any thing against them. Whereupon they took heart a little, and were contented to salute him with a sullen and cold aspect, which made it apparent that if he had not been son of the King, they would not have render'd him that civility. On the other side, Sextus who never consider'd any thing besides his own pleasure, judg'd Clelia so fair at this instant, that his old passion reviv'd in his heart for this excellent person. He beheld her with agitation of mind; and approaching to her Chariot with earnestness, he address'd his speech to Amilcar with the same cheerfulness he could have done at the time when he was in Rome. I confess (said he to Amilcar) I was in an error when heretofore I preferr'd brown beauties before the fair, since 'tis certain I never saw nor never shall see any person so beautiful as Clelia. This speech of Sextus minding Clelia and Valeria of the lamentable death of Lucretia (because it was in maintaining the beauty of that vertuous woman that he had spoken against the fair) they blisht with indignation, and Clelia speaking to him, No, no, my Lord (said she) do not give your self the trouble to commend me, but know there is no surer way to make me displeasing to my self, than to signifie to me that I please you. Therefore, if you believe me, depart from hence; besides (added she) I conceive 'tis no great pleasure to you to see the Janiculum delivered to the Romans. Your aspect, Madam (reply'd Sextus) makes them that behold it, unmindful of their own felicities. But, my Lord (interrupted Amilcar) I know not whether it be not a new unhappiness to you, to see Clelia according to the present posture of affairs; and therefore, I think it would be good you satisfi'd her desire. Go, my Lord, go (interrupted Valeria, who could not contain her self) go hide your crimes in some place so remote from Rome, that you may never there meet a friend of Lucretia. But to what place soever you go, remember there is not a moment wherein a hundred thousand persons do not hate you. I should laugh at their hatred (answer'd he, without being mov'd) were I lov'd but by one person. If you desire to be so by any one (reply'd Valeria) go into some place where you are not known, and where you may change all your inclinations; for if you do not, you will be driven out every where, as you are from Rome: and remember, 'tis the most faithful friend of Lucretia that foretels you this day, you will alwaies be as unfortunate as you are criminal. Since there are pleasures in all places (reply'd he) I make no great reckoning of banishment. Pleasures (said Plotina) are not many to those that are exil'd. Not to such as are covetous and ambitious (answer'd he) but they are to be found every where by those that seek after them, and prefer them above all things. Whilst Sextus was speaking thus, Amilcar made a sign to Telanus of the disgust his presence gave to these fair Virgins; wherefore to deliver them from it, he commanded the Chariots to advance; for just about that time also all the forces of the Janiculum were arriv'd. So Telanus causing the Chariots to be drawn into the midst of them, Sextus was constrain'd to return to his own Quarter. But before he parted from Clelia's Chariot, Know (said he to her with unparalleled boldness) I lose not the hope to be happy; and having lost Rome for Lucretia, I should be still ready to lose a hundred Kingdoms for you, if I had them. After this, Lucilius coming up to joyn with Telanus, the whole body marcht towards the Quarter of Porfenna. Where when the fair Virgins were arriv'd, Lucilius went to know the King's pleasure concerning presenting them before him. But Porfenna having understood Clelia was amongst them, would not see them, and sent to seek the Prince his son, to the end he might not entertain them, giving order they should be put into tents, serv'd well, and guarded diligently. Nevertheless Aronces who had been advertis'd by Telanus that Clelia was amongst the Hostages, us'd his interest with the Princesses of the Leontines, to oblige Galerita to come that day to the Camp; and he caus'd such diligent notice to be given him when the Chariots would arrive, that he was precisely at the place where they made a halt, whilst Lucilius went to receive Porfenna's Orders. He was habited this day more splendidly than ordinary, tho in a military attire. His Horse was of a dapple-gray, his Feathers were white, Isabella, black, and sky-colour, he had a scarf of the same colours buckled upon his shoulder with the muzzle of a golden Lyon enrich'd with great Diamonds. The guard of his Sword was of the same; and in short, his garb was so magnificent, that he drew the eyes of all. He was also lookt upon very favourably by Clelia, who made it very apparent that the sight of the person lov'd embellishes, at the first appearance after absence; for as soon as Clelia perceiv'd Aronces, her eyes became more sparkling, her complexion had a fuller tincture of carnation, joy augmented the gracefulness of her mouth, and all the charms of her countenance became thereby the more inevitable. Aronces on his part, could not at that moment reflect on all the consequences that might follow upon this interview, but so gave up himself to joy, that alighting from his Horse, he went directly to Clelia, who descended from her Chariot, together with her Companions; and it hapned to be in a place where she could do it conveniently, for there was a large and thick-spread tree about ten paces from her Chariot. Ah! Madam (said he to her, after having saluted her and those that follow'd her) is it lawful for me to rejoice to see you in a place where I am not Master? yet you would forbid me in vain to do so, for 'tis impossible for me to see you without resenting a pleasure which I am unable to express. That which I have to see you, my Lord (answer'd she) teaches me sufficiently, that the first sentiments of the heart are not in a people disposing according as the condition of their fortune requires; for tho I am alwaies very unhappy, yet I am extream joyful that I can also tell you I am alwaies the same, provided you be not changed. Ah! Madam (cry'd Aronces) that which you say is not obliging, and you have too little esteem of me, if you do not repent of it. After this, Clelia told Aronces that Plotina was her sister, and that tho Horatius was her brother, yet was she alwaies his friend: so that there was a very sweet and ingenious conversation among these amiable persons. As they were in it, Lucilius came to bring Porfenna's Orders; but they so strict, that out of friendship he counsel'd the Prince not to oppose them, nor provoke the King. This Order sensibly afflicted Aronces, Clelia, her Companions, and Amilcar, who was come to them; but yet it was necessary to obey it. So Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina re-entered into their Chariot, after Aronces accompani'd by Amilcar had told the admirable person he lov'd, that she ought to fear nothing, and that he would dye rather than be wanting in fidelity to her. Aronces being mounted on Horse-back, and the Chariots beginning to march in order to conduct the fair Virgins to the Tents which were appointed for them, they beheld a Troop of Ladies appear on Horse-back, in very great gallantry, and following a stately Chariot that went very slowly, which was the Queen of Hetruria, and with her Melintha, and a very fair and amiable person nam'd Herfilia. She that rid in the head of these Ladies was the Princess of the Leontines, her Horse being white with a black star in the forehead; her attire was of a flying stuff, silver and blue, and the shape of it very agreeable and advantageous; she wore hanging at a rich scarf that was fastned with a knot of Diamonds, a little Bow of Ebony garnisht with gold, and a Quiver of the same adorn'd with jewels. Her hair curl'd in half rings was carelessly spread upon her shoulders. So that having upon her head a great Plume of Feathers, the colours of which were pleasing and well suited, and the order irregular (as I may so speak) made an agreeable confusion, this Princess never appear'd more beautiful than she did this day. She was follow'd by Aurelisa, Terentia, and Amiclea, and several other Ladies very handsome and gallantly clothed. As soon as Aronces beheld this fair Troop, he left Clelia and went to meet the Queen of Hetruria and the Princesses of the Leontines, to the end to desire their protection of that excellent Virgin. In the mean time the Chariots of the twenty fair Romans, whom Lot had chosen for Hostages, turning to the right hand towards the Tyber, were not so distant but Clelia could discern the magnificent garb of the Princesses of the Leontines, and with what a respectful gesture Aronces saluted her; for indeed out of his desire to induce her to protect Clelia, he approacht to her with extraordinary respect. Upon which Clelia having her heart instant'd with new affection towards Aronces, whom she lately saw, and affected with discontent occasion'd tion'd by the rigorous order of Porfenna, her mind became so troubled, that she could not hinder her self from giving some signs of her inquietude. She chang'd colour several times, she had her head alwayes turn'd toward the side where the Princess of the Leontines was, as long as she was in sight, and moreover she sigh'd very heavily. But that which compleated her anxiety, was, that putting forth her head; she heard one of those that guarded her, saying to another as they beheld Aronces, See, our Prince there is much taken up with his new Mistress. These words were no sooner understood by Clelia, but jealousie as suddenly seiz'd upon her heart, as an hour before Love did upon that of Sextus. But whilst this secret trouble was exciting in her breast, Plotina and Valeria were reasoning concerning Porfenna's Order. Nevertheless the change hapned in Clelia's fair eyes did not escape their observation; whereupon Valeria addressing to this admirable person, Whence arises this new sadness? (said she) and what thought has come in your minde? Tho Porfenna's Order be something severe, yet we are delivered from an unpleasing ceremony, in that we shall not be presented to him. Therefore since I believe he dares not violate the Law of Nations, nor treat you ill, I see no cause for the excessive melancholy that appears in your eyes. For my part (said Plotina) I am of Valeria's mind; and therefore let me intreat you, my dear sister, not to abandon your self to sadness. When the heart is possess'd with jealousie (answer'd she blushing) it is not possible but that it should also be abandon'd to sadness. But how can you become jealous in so short a time? (said Plotina). Clelia seeing her self urg'd by her friends, told them what she heard, and what she observ'd. But do you not know (said Valeria) Aronces suffers it to be believ'd that he is amorous of the Princess of the Leontines to the end Porfenna might not propound to him the marriage of the Prince of Ceres daughter? I know it (answer'd Clelia) but I know too that the Princess of the Leontines, is infinitely charming, that I am unfortunat, and that it is not impossible but that Aronces conceiving he cannot marry me, has suffer'd his heart to be toucht with the beauty of that Princess; for, for my own part, I find that were I a man, I could not chuse but love her. Ah! my dear sister (cry'd Plotina) you think you should love this Princess if you were a man, only because you have at present a great disposition not to love her. That is, in brief, the jealousie which will cause you to hate her, makes her appear more lovely than really she is, tho she is so in a high degree. But however, you are unjust; for after all Aronces has done for you, you suspect him upon too light an occasion. No, no, (reply'd Valeria) blame not Clelia so much; for when a person loves ardently and is unfortunat, it is very easie for jealousie to arise without cause; and certainly only such as know not how to love, are wholly free from jealousie. These fair Virgins spoke many things more to this purpose, till they arriv'd at the Tents prepar'd for them, where they were receiv'd with magnificence and respect. Lucilius and Telanus caus'd them to be attended with all imaginable care, and omitted nothing that might serve to evidence themselves the most honorable persons in the World. Nevertheless at the same time, not daring to disobey Porfenna's Order, they caus'd them to be guarded diligently. This King (imagining there had been some deceit in the choice of the Hostages, and that Clelia was purposely sent to his Camp out of hope to mollifie him, and to augment Aronces's love by her presence) was much displeas'd about it, both against the Romans and against Aronces, whom he suspected to have had some influence in the business. Yet seeing him arrive with the Princess of the Leontines, he knew not what to think of it. But Galerita and the Princess being much solicitous to serve Aronces, as soon as they came to Porfenna's presence, they declar'd the joy they resentid in seeing the peace so well advanc'd, and askt him wherefore he did not see the Hostages. Because (answer'd he) the person is sent amongst them who of all the world undoubtedly hates me most. And therefore (added he, looking upon Aronces) I absolutely forbid you to see her, or have any correspondence with her. My Lord (said the dejected Prince) the order you have given for the guarding of the fair Romans, is so strict, that it will be no merit to obey you; but if it be lawfull for me to answer something that is contrary to your sentiments, I shall beseech you to consider that nothing ought to be more sacred than the persons of Hostages. I grant it (reply'd Porfenna) and 'tis to that end that I require they be diligently guarded. Aronces judging then that Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines would doe him more service if himself were not present than if he were, he withdrew, and left them in effect the liberty to protect himself in protecting Clelia. Yet they durst not speak to Porfenna concerning that admirable Lady in particular, but only of her and all her Companions in general. At first the King of Hetruria would not allow that any persons should see them; but the two Princesses so earnestly represented to him that that would cause an ill rumor in Rome, as if they were kept Prisoners, that he yeilded to their Counsel, being contented only to prohibit the Prince his son the liberty of seeing them; but he granted the Princesses permission to goe and visit them. In the mean time the Prince Titus who alwayes lov'd Colatina passionately, went from Tarquins Quarter to that of Porfenna, to endeavour to get liberty to see her; Sextus who was become violently amorous of Clelia, went thither too with the same purpose: and the fierce Tullia, whose mind was alwayes bent to doe mischief to some or other, and to make all things subservient to her revenge, or ambition, devis'd in her mind (so fertile in inventions of wickedness) what she should doe to hinder the accomplishment of the peace, or at least to torment Clelia. Tarquins for his part, in the midst of his misfortunes had his thoughts employ'd upon Clelia, and was something pleas'd, to hear Aronces was deny'd liberty to visit her. The day after the fair Romans came to Porfenna's Camp, the Queen of Hetruria and the Princess of the Leontines went to see them; but by the way they met with Sextus, and could not hinder him from accompanying them, tho they urg'd him as much as they could to forbear. As for the Prince Titus, he was so belov'd by both parties, that they did not scruple to take him into this visit; and the curiosity to see these twenty fair Romans being almost general, the Princesses were accompany'd by the generous Melintha, the amiable Hersilia, Amiclea, Aurelisa, Terentia, and several men of Quality. The Roman Ladies having been advertis'd by Lucilius and Telanus of the visit they were to receive, they adorned themselves more speedily this day; and Clelia out of a jealous conceit, and to please the Queen of Hetruria, omitted nothing that conduc'd to make her appear amiable. Only Hermilia was in a negligent dress, which testifi'd she did not care to please: yet being fair, young, and tall, she did not cease to be very graceful. It may be said, there was never a more glorious sight, than when these twenty fair Virgins went to receive the Queen of Hetruria at the entry of their Tents. For the Lot had so happily chosen them out, that there was not one of them but was extremely handsome and agreeable. Valeria, Clelia, and Plotina being in the front of this fair Company, the first as being daughter of the first Consul spoke thus in the name of all her Companions, when she saluted Galerita. Had my Companions and my self had liberty to do our duty, Madam (said she very gracefully) we should have had the honour to have gone and saluted your Majesty as soon as we saw you arrive in the Camp: But, Madam, since we are not in our own power, no doubt you are so equitable as not to accuse us of being deficient in the respect we owe you. The Queen of Hetruria very civilly receiv'd that which Valeria spoke to her, and also made an answer to it; but it was almost without thinking what she was doing; for the Princess of the Leontines having before caus'd her to take notice of Clelia, she beheld her with so great admiration that she could not refrain from giving advantageous signs of what she thought of her. As soon as she had done answering Valeria, she turned her self towards the Princess of the Leontines, and speaking to her, Report is injurious to Clelia's beauty (said she) for certainly it transcends all the praises that are publish'd of it, and I believe it can never be sufficiently extoll'd. Galerita had scarce spoke this, but all that accompany'd her, perceiving it was free for them to speak what they thought, commended Clelia so highly, that she blusht at it; whereby modestly imbellishing her more, she confirm'd all the applauses that were given her. After which Galerita, having commended all these fair Virgins in general, separated Clelia from the rest, and talkt with her for some time, whilst the Princess of the Leontines, Melintha, Hermilia, and the other Ladies were speaking to Valeria, Plotina, and their companions. As for Prince Titus, he entertain'd Colatina, whom he had not seen since his leaving Rome; but Sextus was wholly silent, and only beheld Clelia so attentively, that it was easie to perceive that he had not lov'd the unfortunate Lutetia more ardently. Amilcar, who had follow'd the Queen of Hetruria, joyn'd in the discourse with the Princess of the Leontines and Plotina; Tellus did the like; Aureliſa and Terentia admir'd these fair Romans; and Valeria and her companions returning them commendations for those they gave, this first conversation pass'd in reciprocal civilities. But Clelia spoke so handsomely to Galerita, that she was as much charm'd with her wit, as her beauty; yet she would not mention any thing to her concerning Aronces, but assur'd her in general, she would protect her in all things, and omit no opportunity to do her good offices. After which turning her self towards the other Roman Ladies, the Princess of the Leontines approacht to Clelia, with intention to assure her she would serve her with all her heart, and give her an account of the sentiments Aronces had for her. But Sextus coming to her at the same moment, it was impossible for her to execute her purpose; besides, that Clelia appear'd to her with so cold an aspect, that this did sufficiently amuse her. Nevertheless, soon after she thought Sextus's presence caus'd that coldness of hers, so that hoping to see her often, she was not very earnest to discourse with her apart. On the contrary believing she should do her a pleasure in taking off Sextus, she pretended to have something to say to this Prince, and accordingly whisper'd a little to him; but presently after, the Queen of Hetruria being retir'd, she could do no more but tell Clelia, she would see her again speedily. Notwithstanding she spoke this with a very obliging air, yet the secret jealousy this fair Virgin had in her breast caus'd her to answer her with some coldness, tho' with sufficient civility. The Queen of Hetruria as she return'd spoke of nothing but the beauty of Clelia, and the charms of her mind. Sextus seem'd so transported with it, that he could not refrain from speaking things which made it apparent he was deeply enamour'd of her; and all that accompany'd Galerita were so taken with her, that they contend'd who should extol her most. Her companions were also much Commended, and tho' fair Ladies love not very much to applaud those that own that advantageous quality, yet Aureliſa, Terentia, and all the rest acknowledg'd nothing could be seign so handsome as Clelia, and that next her, Valeria, Plotina, Hermilia, and Colatina were the most charming persons in the world. When Galerita arriv'd at her Tent, she understood that the cruel Tullia was in private conference with Porſenna, and she was told of it by Aronces, who was extremely troubled at it. And so was she too; for she knew well of what dangerous artifices this person was capable. But to comfort him, she talk'd with him so advantageously of Clelia, that it gave him satisfaction in some measure. You have reason Aronces (said Galerita to him) to prefer Clelia above all the rest of the world; for being noble, vertuous, ingenious, and the greatest beauty that ever liv'd, and having an affection for you, I conceive nothing is to be desir'd for your happiness but the consent of Porſenna. Ah! Madam (cry'd Aronces) that consent is hard to be obtain'd. I confess it (answer'd the Queen) but nevertheless I am perswaded, if the King saw Clelia, it would be more easie to prevail with him; and I purpose to continue some dayes in the Camp, that I may endeavour to bring him to resolve upon it. Aronces thanked Galerita for this design of hers, and afterwards requested the Princess of the Leontines, to assist her in moving Porſenna to see Clelia. As he left the Queen, he saw his Father the King, who seem'd to be sufficiently pensive; he understood by some of the Officers that were faithful to him, that when Tullia departed from Porſenna, he told her, he would keep his word, provided she kept hers; and that this Princess went away with an aspect sufficiently satisfi'd. But the unfortunate Aronces not being able to see Clelia, writ to her in the most passionate manner in the world, and oblig'd Titus, Tellus, and Amilcar to tell her a hundred things every day in his name. At the same time, liberty of intercourse between Rome and the Camp being restor'd, excepting for such Romans as had follow'd Tarquin, the Princess of the Leontines went to see the Prince her Brother, who was a little recover'd; and Herminius, Horatius, Octavius, Emilius, Zenocrates, Anacreon, and many others caus'd themselves to be presented to Porſenna, to the end they might have liberty to visit the twenty fair Virgins that were given as Hostages. By this means the conversation became very delightful both at the Tents of the Queen of Hetruria, the Princess of the Leontines, and those in which the fair fair Romans were. As for Mutius, his mind was so incens'd with the last conversation he had with Valeria, that he would not go thither; and he was observ'd to avoid almost all the world, and to be discontented and pensive, tho' the glory he had acquir'd ought to have afforded him very great satisfaction. About this time the Prince of Messene found himself reduc'd to extremity; but at his death he caus'd Themistus to be advertis'd that he might go and receive the recompence of his fidelity, and that some daies before he had stopt a man that had order to deliver a Letter to him from the Prince of Syracusa, and another from the Princess Lindamira, which inform'd him that he might return. And accordingly Themistus understanding this agreeable news, and seeing the War ended, hied himself to depart as soon as the wound in his arm should be cured. The Prince of Messene's death, and the happiness of his Rival, serving then for discourse to all the world, it hapned that Clelia and Plotina observing Zenocrates very melancholy, the latter askt him if he had any particular interest in that adventure. Alas! Madam (answer'd he, sighing) I am concern'd onely with my own miseries, of which both the felicity and misfortunes of others do alike reduce the remembrance in my mind. Yet some troublesome thing must needs have befallen you within this little while (said Clelia) for the bare remembrance of remote unhappinesses does not produce the melancholy which I perceive in your eyes. 'Tis easie to appear sad (reply'd Zenocrates) when greater are apprehended to come. But Valeria interrupting this discourse by speaking something apart to Clelia, Plotina continu'd, and so urg'd Zenocrates to tell her the cause of his discontent, that he confest to her he was extremely jealous, but would not discover to her who was the person he lov'd. After which Plotina told Clelia what Zenocrates had confest to her. An hour after the Princess of the Leontines being arriv'd, Clelia heard Amiclea say to Zenocrates, as she pass'd by him, You are to blame, and more than you can imagine. She also observ'd that the Princess of the Leontines blush'd as she lookt upon Zenocrates, and that Zenocrates's dejectedness increas'd by beholding the Princess. So that comparing all these circumstances, she conjectur'd that Zenocrates lov'd the Princess, and that Arances was the cause of his jealousy. Which thought so augmented her own, that she was forc'd to pretend her self a little indispos'd, for fear lest the alteration of her humour should be taken notice of. Nevertheless she had so great curiosity to know perfectly the Adventures of the Princess of the Leontines, that she request'd Plotina and Valeria to ingage her to relate them; and these two fair Ladies acted with such address, after Zenocrates was gone, that they prevail'd with her to grant that which Clelia desir'd. That which you request of me (said this charming Princess to them) is harder to grant you than you imagine: but I cannot refuse a thing that is possible, to three such amiable persons as you; moreover, to speak freely, I foresee that within a few daies, that will be known which I have hitherto so carefully conceal'd. However (added she) Amiclea must relate to you what you desire to know; for I confest to you that I should not be able to tell you divers things, the bare remembrance of which makes me blush, tho' they be not criminal. Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina, having consented to what she desir'd, she went away, and left Amiclea with these three fair Virgins, who being alone in their Tent, besecch'd her to give them a full Relation of all that concern'd the Princess of the Leontines. And thereupon according to the order she had receiv'd from her, she began to speak in this manner.

The HISTORY of the Princess LYSIMENA.

IF you did not know the Princess of the Leontines, I should begin her History with her Elogium, thereby to interest you in her misfortunes; but since you are not ignorant that she is very beautiful and very amiable, that she is a person of extraordinary wit and merit, and that nevertheless her vertue surpasses all her charms; it remains only that I acquaint you with her infelicities, to the end to excite your compassion to her, and to relate her Adventures to you, thereby to encrease your admiration of her. I will not take much pains to describe to you how the Court of Leontium stood when we were there; I shall onely tell you by the way, that there was none more delightful in all Sicily, tho' (as you know) there be a great number there, and it be at this day one of the places most fam'd for splendor and politeness in the world. The Country being very handsome and fertile, the air agreeable, and liberty sufficient, it is undoubtedly extreme pleasant living there. But it must be confest, that during the first years of the Princess Lysimena's life, the Court of Leontium was more delightful than it can be at this day. For when the principal Persons of a Court have well-temper'd minds, their example renders all their inferiors more civilis'd and vertuous. The late Prince of Leontium was certainly a very accomplish'd Prince; and the Princess of Leontium, his wife, was indu'd with all the Qualities that can cause a Person of Honour to be admir'd. Moreover, it may be assur'd that the Princess Lysimena resembles her as much, as Artemidorus does the late Prince, his Father. He that reigns at this day, has unquestionably some Qualities that ought to be commended; for he is indu'd with wit and courage; but he is naturally distrustful, excessively jealous of his Authority, when he need not, and besides has some inclinations to cruelty. But to return to the Princess Lysimena, you shall know, that she from her infancy was very amiable, & that at twelve years old she was the greatest ornament of the Court. It was believ'd at that time, that she had but one Brother, for you must know, Artemidorus at the age of ten years was taken by Pyrates, as the Prince of the Leontium sent him to Greece under the conduct of a wise Governor called Cleanthus, to be brought up there till he should come to the age of eighteen years, after which no tidings had been heard of him. So that when the Prince his Father dy'd, Lysimena remain'd under the Authority of the Prince of Leontium her Brother, who Reigns at this day. Whilst the Princess her mother was alive, she was not without some consolation; besides, being then but sixteen years old, grief more easily wore out of her mind, and she became capable of all the joy that can be found in a splendid Court by a Person that holds the chief rank there in all things, and sees her self as much superior to all about her both in beauty, wit, and Quality. The Princess Lysimena has always had the advantage to be free from one of those defects which are sufficiently common in those of her rank; for she had never any of that intolerable pride, through which such as are possess'd with it, think they do too much honour to those that serve them, when

when they only take notice of the respect they bear to them; who despise all that are not of a very considerable rank; who are not oblig'd by any thing whatsoever, who will be lov'd without loving again; who scorn gratitude, who will be yielded to in every thing, who understand nothing of liberality, and who have not so much as the art to chuse their own pleasures well. On the contrary, I can assure you she has alwaies very well known how to discern the truth of all things, she has lov'd those that lov'd her person more than such as respected her condition, and has been as diligent to render her self worthy to be lov'd, as if her birth and beauty had afforded her no advantage. And to speak truth, the diligence she has us'd has admirably succeeded. I was some years elder than the Princess; but she attaining to an early prudence, lov'd rather to converse with such as exceeded her in age, than such as were younger: so that my mother being very much belov'd by the late Princess of Leontium, I went frequently to the Palace, where I had the good fortune to be chosen amongst a hundred more amiable Virgins than my self, to be the Princess favourite. At that time a very near Kinsman of the Prince of Syracusa who dwelt at Leontium, became extreme amorous of Lyfimena; his name was Meleontus, and he a person of undoubted courage, wit, and magnificence; but he is naturally distrustful: and tho he be very noble, yet he is so little master of himself when he is in choler that he is at such times capable of many things which he would not have done when his choler is pass'd. Moreover, Meleontus is a very goodly Person, and has a kind of noble boldness in the air of his countenance, which suits both with his Quality and humour. Being usually a partaker in all the pleasures of the Prince, he had the freedom to see the Princess Lyfimena, very often. Whereby it is to be wondred, if seeing a most amiable person every day, he could not hinder himself from loving her. Besides, to speak truth, it was so much the mode to love Lyfimena, that it was said at Court, She had not one slave that was not amorous of her. It was discover'd that a Painter, as he drew her Picture, became her Lover; and one of the Gardeners of the Palace, to whom she had spoken very often (because she much delights in flowers) lost his reason through the excess of love he had for her. Moreover, it was for this cause that she was styl'd so as she is at this day; for a certain person saying one day pleasantly, that to distinguish her from the Princess her Mother, who was call'd the Princess of Leontium, she ought to be term'd the Princess of the Leontines, since she reign'd in the hearts of all the Prince her Brothers Subjects; the conceit was taken up, and she came by degrees to be generally styl'd so. Nevertheless, this universal love caus'd her to be hated and envy'd by several beauties: Clidamira who you know, was certainly a little envious at her, but amongst others there was a woman of Quality, that thought her self more beautiful than Lyfimena, who proceeded so far to wish her as much mischief as if the Princess had undone her in her fortune, tho she was guilty of no other crime but being as amiable as you see. This woman, who is call'd Amerimba, is indeed very fair, and has no common temper of mind, as you shall know in the sequel of my discourse. Meleontus having been her servant for some time, and afterwards forsaking her to adore Lyfimena, she thereupon began to hate the Princess (as I told you) altho she dissimled it as much as she could. In the mean time Meleontus omitted nothing which he judg'd might serve to make his passion known to Lyfimena, who had no inclination at all towards him. But because the Prince her Brother did not disapprove this affection, she durst not treat him unkindly: but her particular humor was so averse from all Courtship, that upon all occasions she commend'd Friendship above Love, maintaining that there is nothing more delightful than to have Friends, and nothing more troublesome than to have Lovers, whether they be lov'd again or no. And accordingly she was very severe to the former, and very gentle at the latter. Zenocrates was at this time at Leontium, where having been very amorous of an amiable Lady nam'd Andromira, his love at length turn'd into friendship. Which, besides, was a friendship without ardour, and not much pleasing; so that he said sometimes laughing, That there is far more pleasure in having a Friend of a Lady that had alwaies been a Friend, than in having one that had been considered as a Mistress, and is no longer lookt upon but as a Friend. Andromira being a little related to me, I frequently reproacht Zenocrates with his change, and this is no unusual subject of our conversation. If you did not know him, I should tell you of the goodness of his personage, the vivacity of his wit, and all the good qualities he is indu'd with; but it will be sufficient to let you know that he is of a very noble extraction, that he is Originally a Greek, tho he was born at a City call'd Herbesa, which was his Father's, and is not far from Leontium; I shall add further, that he was at that time of great esteem in this Court. That which hapned between him and Andromira being a very rare case, all the world talk'd of it, and Lyfimena making advantage of it in reference to her own sentiments, said, it was easie to perceive thereby the expedience of returning to Friendship. For my part (said I to her one day in the presence of Meleontus and Zenocrates) I do not conceive how any one is capable of Friendship towards another that has been lov'd; for if I had once had an affection for a man, I think I could not desist from it without hating him, or at least without having an indifference for him, which could never become Friendship. I am of Amiclea's mind (said Meleontus) and I do not think it possible for me ever to be a Friend to my Mistress. For my part (said Lyfimena) Friendship is so high in my esteem, that I account it good at all times. But how is it possible (said Meleontus) for Love to become Friendship? What becomes of the desires, impatiencies, melancholies, fears, transports, little and great pleasures, suspitions, hope, jealousy, and all the other passions that are inseparable from Love? In truth (said Zenocrates) I cannot tell you what is become of all these, but I know at present I have the greatest tranquillity of the world in reference to Andromira, and that she cannot give me either great trouble or great pleasure. I behold her without desires or without hopes, I should serve her if it were in my power, I esteem her, I love her, and I visit her also very often: but for the most part, our conversation is but luke-warm, and our Friendship has nothing in it that affords much inquietude or great delight. But did you ever love that person? (said Meleontus). More than you can imagine (answer'd Zenocrates). I can witness (reply'd I) that he has made very amorous Verses upon her, and I have seen him inquieted, jealous, and much solicitous concerning her. But that which I admire most most (said Lyfimena) is; that Andromira should be capable of returning to Friendship as well as he. Ah! Madam (said Meleontus) Zenocrates must needs have lov'd but weakly when he was amorous, since he could become a Friend of a Lover; however, I am well assur'd (said he with a lower voice) I finde I shall never have any Friendship for the admirable Lyfimena. That which you speak is so disobliging to me (answer'd the Princess) that you deserve I should give you a sharp answer. That which I said is so true and so passionate, Madam (reply'd he) that I cannot believe it possible for you to be so unjust as to hate me for it. After this other Ladies being arriv'd, the discourse was changed. Nevertheless, from that day Meleontus became more confident to speak to Lyfimena concerning his Love, altho she always forbid him, and Zenocrates became so intimate a friend to her, that no man in the Court was so high in her favour, nor had so much liberty to see her. For Zenocrates had in a short time got such a reputation of being inconstant, that not fearing he would become her Lover, she was joyful that he was her Friend. We oftentimes reproacht him that he had only the beginnings of love; and he was so expert at raillery thereupon, that it render'd our conversation very delightful. Meleontus's love in the mean time augmented to the highest degree he was capable of, he being a person more inclin'd to this passion than to Friendship. These two persons were often together, and seem'd to be considerably intimate, tho indeed they communicated nothing of importance one to another; for Zenocrates loves not to declare his secrets, and Meleontus is so distrustful, that he car'd not to put confidence in him, especially in what concern'd Lyfimena. 'Tis true, he had no great secrets to tell of in this respect, for tho he had the most violent passion for the Princess, that ever was, yet she answer'd it so little, that she afforded him no great matter for secrecie. Nevertheless, he was not discourag'd; for tho the Princess of Leontium did not much approve his pretensions to the Princess her daughter, yet the Prince her Son so upheld him in them, that he was not destitute of hope. In the mean time there were made continual feasts, at which Zenocrates was always present as Lyfimena's friend. This Quality was no doubt very advantageous to him and gave him many occasions of conversing with her, which otherwise he could not have had, if his inconstancie had not secur'd him from being apprehended by Lyfimena as a man that was amorous of her. So that by degrees she came to have a very dear friendship for Zenocrates; who one the other side lov'd her no doubt as much as he could, and often told her, that he lov'd her more than four of his Mistresses. Thus Lyfimena taking much delight in the amity of such an agreeable Friend, and (if I dare say it) in mine, daily confirm'd her self in the opinion she then had, That Love is less sweet than Friendship. Zenocrates in the mean time was better treated as her Friend, than Meleontus was as her Lover. Andromira was sometimes present in their conversations, and one day the Princess ask'd her, whether Zenocrates were a more agreeable Friend than a Lover. In truth, Madam (answer'd Andromira, smiling) I cannot well resolve your Question; all that I can tell you, is, that when our affection was a little more tender than friendship, we had more pain and more pleasure; but at this day when it has chang'd its nature, we doe not divert our selves much in our familiarity. That answer of Andromira, to Lyfimena seem'd to her so remarkable, that being alone the next day in her Closet, she made a description of that person's sentiments, she painted her out to the life, and did me the favour to shew me what she writ upon this subject, which was extremely pleasant. For without pencil or colours, she made so exact a picture of Andromira, that none could but know it. At first the Princess would have conceal'd this Portraiture; but telling Zenocrates of it, and Zenocrates not being able to hide a thing made for the honour of the Princess's wit, told it to the Prince, the Prince to Meleontus, and Meleontus to the whole Court. Upon which, as all the world is full of imitators, good or bad, in a few dayes all the men of the Court became Painters, and all the women made their own Pourtraits, without considering that it is very difficult to speak handsomely of ones self: for if a person set forth his own commendations, he becomes ridiculous and insufferable; if he blame himself justly, he would doe better to amend his faults than publish them; and if he speak neither good nor ill of himself he is sufficiently tedious.

But in brief, a Constellation stronger than Reason put all the World into this vein. The most excusable were such as overcommended themselves, for they delineated themselves according to their self-conceit; and the most faulty were such as made Satyrical Pourtraitures against persons whose goodness and vertue ought to have exempted them from envy. Tho indeed the Authors injur'd themselves, by describing themselves amongst all the worthy persons, and did no hurt to those they intended to injure. Upon this occasion all discourses were only concerning Pourtraitures, every one had some in their Pockets, and the end of the Composers was only to give Copies from one to another. One day, amongst an honourable Company, at the Palace of the Princess of Leontium where Lyfimena was at that time, arose a discourse concerning the Portraitures in fashion. For my part (said Meleontus) I like not this ardency of doing that always which others doe, and that because some one person has made a handsome Portrait, therefore all the world should betake themselves to make bad. In truth (added I) I believe there is not a person at Leontium that has a Looking-glass, but has made their own picture, excepting my self who could never resolve to speak either good or ill in my own behalf. After this, Lyfimena ask'd if there were any new Portraiture, and Zenocrates told her two were made of the same person by no ordinary invention; which the Princess desiring to see, Zenocrates who had them, gave them to her to read, telling her, the first of them seem'd to be made by some Lover or some friend of Amerintha. I easily believe (answer'd Lyfimena) it might be made by a Lover; but as for a Friend, I doubt it; for Amerintha loves not to have Friends, and I am perswaded few people have many, against their own wills. After this Lyfimena began to read that which follows.

The Portraiture of AMERINTHA.

AMerintha is of a tall and handsome stature, of a good aspect, and has all the lustre of a great Beauty: her eyes are sparkling and sweet, they excite love, fear, and hope, all at the same time. They are the fairest azure in the World, and

and her hair is of the most goodly flaxen that ever was seen. She has a little mouth, ruddy and smiling, and a thousand charms in the air of her countenance. Her complexion is clear even to admiration, and she has such an agreeable mind, in which sweetness and confidence, modesty and gallantry, cheerfulness and sometimes pensiveness appear together. She is obliging and civil; she speaks well, she has a good grace, she pleases all that see her; and whoever is not in love the first time he sees her, is incapable of ever being so. Her heart is resolute enough to undertake difficult things without scruple, nothing perplexes or astonishes her; she trusts always either to her beauty or to her address. And indeed she has reason to confide in them, since to this hour she has almost always done whatever she desired to do, nothing being able to resist her; and I believe she will perpetually do her own pleasure.

It must be confess'd (said Lysimena, after she had done reading) that Amerintha has all that this Portraiture attributes to her. I acknowledge it (answer'd Melcontus) but she has some things that are not express'd in it. Nevertheless (added I) there is none but would know her by this description. If it be so (said Zenocrates) you will not judge the other Portrait made of her to be very like. There are Pictures sometimes (answer'd Lysimena) that do not resemble one another, and yet are very like the persons for whom they were made: but to judge whether this be so, let us see it. After which she began to read the Second.

Portraiture of AMERINTHA.

Amerintha is a Person (you think perhaps I am going to say Wonderful, but it is more just to say) Incomprehensible; and no doubt you will agree with me by that time I have made her Picture. Her beauty is gay, her Complexion pale, her Eyes sufficiently terrible, and her words pass through one of the handsomest mouths in the World. Her Hair is fair, and the air of her whole Person noble enough; but her Hands are not made to catch Hearts, for they are so deform'd, that she always hides them in a corner of a great veil she wears, for fear she should shew them either to her Lovers or herself. Nor are her Arms more handsome; her neck too is sufficiently ill shap'd: and for my part, I confess my imagination persuades me that all which I do not see, more resembles that which displeases me than that which seems agreeable to me. But which is strange, that which is handsome in this Person serves only to injure her; since she does not attract Lovers but to make her self enemies; and it may be said she never causes her self to be lov'd, but the better to render her self hated. For they that do not love her, admire her more than they that do: because as soon as any one has had time enough to know her, he finds that she loves none but her self, that her heart is full of dissimulation, and that she uses a certain false goodness only the better to deceive such as she desires to destroy, that her Wit only serves her to frame intrigues, and to perplex all those she calls friends; that her confidence is seldom employ'd but to performe actions worthy to be repented of; that she does Civilities to none but those from whom she knows she shall receive greater; that she employs craft in all things, and understands not true Prudence. She is expert enough in disguising truth, tho on some occasions she has been liable to conviction of falsehood; she loves liberality in another, and never practises it; she would have it believ'd that she knows how to love, tho she never lov'd any. In the meantime she does many things which nothing but love seems to be able to cause them to do whom it absolutely possesseth. But lastly, the greatest truth that can be said of her, is, that no other Person ever excited so much love and hatred, or attracted so many praises and reproaches: and that which troubles her most of all, is, that all Persons begin with admiration, and always end with contempt.

Ah! Zenocrates (said Lysimena) If there were any stranger here, I would say this does not much resemble Amerintha, but since I conceive none can contradict what is here said of her, I must acknowledge this second Portraiture resembles Amerintha as much as the first; for tho one extols her, and the other blames her, yet both are like her. The first would seem admirably well made to a man that had seen her but eight dayes; and the latter to those that have lov'd her a long time. He that made this Picture (answer'd Zenocrates) calls these Pourtraits, two-fac'd Pourtraits; because in the one he speaks all the good, and in the other all the evil. This malicious invention has no doubt some wit in it (reply'd Lysimena) but for that it may prejudice virtuous persons, I will not commend it. Not but that Amerintha deserves her picture should be made in such manner, that it may please every one; but however, 'tis better to conceal the defects of others, than to discover them, altho it be never so ingeniously done. That which you say, is very generous, Madam (answer'd I) but above all things it behoves not to reproach any person for want of Beauty, or for bad fortune, unless people desire to be accounted malicious or scurrilous; and if it be lawful to speak disadvantageous truths, it ought to be against such as are wicked, back-biters, slanderers, cheaters, envious at others glory; because sometimes well drawing the Character of a bad man, vice may be render'd odious. But, withall, these descriptions ought to be general, and not to point at any one in particular, unless it be necessary to make perfidious persons known, for fear they deceive such as are not so. For as in certain places of great Rivers, Marks are set up, to advertise such as pass that way, of Rocks hid under the water, which might occasion Shipwrack; so sometimes dangerous persons may be made known, to the end the virtuous may more easily avoid them. That which you say is extreme reasonable (reply'd Zenocrates) and whereas so many unprofitable Pourtraitures are made, I wish some were compos'd that might be of good use. I would have an envious man painted forth, that so envy might be hated; a detractor, to the end to cause detraction to be detested; a deceiver, that that perfidiousness might be render'd odious; and in like manner many other evil qualities. But as for an inconstant person (interrupted Lyfimena smiling) you say nothing of him. Tho I am perhaps less such than I am taken to be (answer'd he) yet I shall not at present offer to say I am not such at all; but only, that for the most part inconstant persons are rather reckon'd amongst the giddy-brain'd, than the wicked; and for that reason I did not think to mention them in this occasion. But as for Amerintha's two-fac'd Portrait, it was compos'd by one that desires not to make a secret of it; all the Court has seen it, and many have since attempted the like. Nevertheless, the Princess so openly profess her self an Enemy to all that made such kinde of things, that in a very few dayes none dar'd to write in that manner; and this is a great instance, that 'tis extremely important for persons of the principal rank in Courts never to approve of those that wound the reputation of others. And it concerns them sufficiently; for, by not permitting the glory of their inferiors to be blemish'd, they preserve their own, and place a Bar between calumny and themselves. Yet this discourse of Lyfimena did not hinder but that Amerintha understanding by Andromira (who told her of it unwittingly) that her Portraiture had been read in the Princesses lodgings, was extremely inrag'd at it, and design'd to doe her some mischief, tho in truth she had no cause to complain of Lyfimena. But dissimulation being necessary to all such as would doe an injury, she made no shew of any disgust at all; but contrarily she visited Lyfimena more frequently, she sought my friendship and absolutely gain'd that of a Virgin who at that time belong'd to the Princess of the Leontines. In the mean time Meleontus was infinitely amorous of Lyfimena, and Zenocrates thinking himself her friend, was her Lover; tho indeed he shortly perceiv'd that he deceiv'd himself. As for the Princess, she thought nothing of it, and was so pleas'd with his friendship, that she boasted of it to all the World. But as one day she was speaking of it to him, he found himself sufficiently perplex'd. For you must know, Zenocrates having deserted all his Mistresses for some time before, seem'd to have nothing else to doe, but to render his devoirs to Lyfimena. Upon which the Princess not desiring that her friendship should restrain him; told him one day pleasantly, that she in no manner pretended to ingross him; and tho she sometimes jest'd with him about his inconstancie, yet she would not hinder him from having some of those half Mistresses, who without possessing his whole heart, might afford him divertisement, and occasion him to write pleasant Letters, and delightful Verses. Zenocrates blusht at this speech of Lyfimena, and was much puzzled how to answer to it. For according to the thoughts he then had, he lookt upon the permission the Princess gave him, as the most cruel in the World. Yet he durst not give her any sign of his passion, of which he saw well she had not the least suspicion; nor was he willing to speak any thing that altogether oppos'd her Counsel. But answering ambiguously to that which she said to him, The Friendship where-with you honour me, Madam (said he to her) must needs be very weak, since instead of correcting my faults, you advise me to abandon my self to them. You have a hundred times reproacht me for my beginnings of Love, but I see now you would have me have three or four Mistresses at once? Is it, Madam (ad-ded he) because my frequent converse is distasteful to you? In no wise (answer'd she smiling) but 'tis only because I have an extreme fear lest Friendship should become fastidious to you. As Zenocrates was going to reply, Meleontus enter'd; whereupon not being able to hide his discomposedness of mind, he withdrew sufficiently pensive. Meleontus had opportunity so seldome to speak to the Princess apart, that he would not lose this; and as soon as Zenocrates was gone forth, he began to speak to her of his passion. I know well Madam (said he to her) that I am going to displease you; but I know also, that if I do not speak to you of my love, I must needs lose either my life or my reason. Not but that I am perswaded (added he without giving her leisure to interrupt him) that you know I love you as much as I am able to love. All my looks, my words, and my actions declare it to you; the Prince likewise being my Protector, speaks to you to my advantage; and your own merit being favourable to me in this case, does not permit you to doubt of my passion. Yes, Madam, not so much but your looking-glass tells you I adore you; but however, I will declare it to your self, at the hazard of seeing as much anger in your eyes, as there is love in my heart. I know well, Meleontus (answer'd Lyfimena) that the Prince my Brother speaking to me in your favour, and approving your affection for me, I ought not to answer you sharply, and that I cannot be offended at what you tell me, without offending him. Therefore I will answer you like a good friend, rather than as an incensed Mistress. I tell you then, with much sincerity, I find no disposition in my heart ever to love any person; and If I did, it would not be your self. Not but that if the Prince my Brother went about to constrain me to marry you, I should be capable to obey him, rather than to make a great noise in the world: but Meleontus, you would be more unhappy thereby, and I should be more miserable too; for, certainly, the love you have for me would soon be chang'd into aversion, when you observ'd the indifferencie I have for you turn'd into hatred. For, indeed, if after what I have said to you, you should oblige the Prince my Brother to force my will. I should believe I had cause to hate you. Ah! Madam (cry'd Meleontus) what you say is extreme rigorous to me to hear, and sufficient to induce me to resolve to be reveng'd upon you, by marrying you against your will. For, altho, Madam, I should be enforc'd to hate you after having marry'd you, yet I should be more happy than I am in loving you without being lov'd, or hoping to be so by you. Hatred has its pleasures as well as Love; there is contempt and revenge in it: whereas when a person loves, tho he be ill-treated, nevertheless he cannot refrain from adoring the person by whom he is so receiv'd. But, Madam, let us not proceed to such hard extremities; doe justice to my love, suffer your self to be prevail'd upon by my constancie; and I assure you, as soon as you resolve to pity my unhappiness, you will account me less worthy of hatred than you doe, and your self less unhappy.

Lyfimena was going to answer, when the Prince of Leontium enter'd, who observing Meleontus's dissatisfaction in his countenance, drew the Princess aside, and told her so earnestly, that she would disoblige him if she did not regard Meleontus as a man deserving to pretend to marry her, that she was extremely afflicted at it. Nevertheless, she ingag'd her self to nothing, and yet did not absolutely tell the Prince, she was incapable to obey him. In the mean time, the fair and dangerous Amarintha, being incens'd in her mind against Lysimena, both because she had drawn away Meleontus from her, and because she believ'd she had took pleasure in reading that humorous Portraiture at her chamber, diligently set her self to observe her. Whereby, having a cunning wit, she came to know that the Princess had a very great aversion for Meleontus, and as violent an inclination for Zenocrates. Wherefore imploying both these passions for her revenge, she endeavour'd to cause Meleontus to marry Lysimena, and to cause her self to be lov'd by Zenocrates, onely to the end to hinder the Princess from being lov'd by him. And indeed, within a short time her revenge became more easie, because the Prince fell in love with her. This induc'd her to give over the design of getting Zenocrates for her Lover; and she did all she could to augment the Prince's passion, that she might consequently more easily obtain the end she propos'd to her self. And tho she hated Meleontus as well as Lysimena, yet out of a malicious craft, she acted as if she desir'd to render him happy, with a secret intention to make him miserable. For being perswaded Lysimena hated him, and had a very tender affection for Zenocrates, she well saw, that she could do nothing more disadvantageous either for him or for her, than to oblige the Prince to force Lysimena to marry Meleontus, tho the passion he had in his Soul suggest'd to him, that a greater felicity could not befall him. To this purpose a great reconciliation was made between Meleontus and Amarintha, who pass'd mutual promises to serve one another in all things. Zenocrates all this while was very amorous of Lysimena, but dar'd not intimate the least sign of it to her; and having experienc'd that in loving Amarintha his love turn'd into friendship, he found that in loving Lysimena, his friendship was become love. As for the Princess, she still thought her affection to Zenocrates was only friendship; so that she imparted all her discontents to him as well as to me: by which means he had the satisfaction to know that he had a great aversion for his Rival, but the grief too, to understand that the Prince highly promoted his interests, and to observe the intimacy between Meleontus and Amarintha, whom the Prince was passionately enamour'd of. Amarintha's purpose on the other side being onely to torment Meleontus, she told him, she believ'd Zenocrates was in love with Lysimena, and that Lysimena took no notice of his boldness. But all the Court talks of it (added she maliciously) and I doubt not but 'tis very important to advertise her of it. Nevertheless, because she would receive this intelligence very ill, if I gave it her, I shall not meddle with the business. Amarintha had no sooner spoke this, but Meleontus wonder'd he had not suspected Zenocrates of loving Lysimena; and as jealousy takes things alwaies in the extremity, he believ'd at the same time that possibly Lysimena was in love with Zenocrates. Which thought taking deep impression in his mind, he resolv'd to be satisfied in the matter, thank'd Amarintha for the information she gave him, tho it render'd him more unhappy. Within a few days after, he went to the Princess, finding her alone, I know not, Madam (said he to her) how you will receive a matter which I have to tell you, but I know the respect alone I have to your glory, induces me to advertise you, that Zenocrates deports himself in such a manner, that it is believ'd he is extremely amorous of you, and that you cannot but perceive it. Because you believe jealousy is an indubitable proof of love (answer'd Lysimena with a cold aspect) no question you would make a Rival to your self, on purpose to have a pretext to act like a jealous Lover. But, Meleontus, have not recourse to such an extravagant device; for I have but too certain a belief that you love me: but to my unhappiness, the knowledg I have of your affection cannot produce the like in me; since to tell you sincerely (added she) I have done all I could to love you, but in vain. However, for what concerns Zenocrates, I answer you, that he is no more but my friend, and as long as he comports himself only as such, I will not be brought to treat him ill as a lover. The Princess had scarce ended these words, but Zenocrates enter'd: as soon as he appear'd, Lysimena blush'd; of which Zenocrates not knowing the cause, the inquietude it gave him caus'd him to do the like. But he soon recover'd himself, and advertis'd Meleontus that the Prince enquir'd for him; so that this Favourite was constrain'd to leave his Rival with his Mistress. As soon as he was gone, Zenocrates perceiving some discontent in the fair eyes of Lysimena, conjur'd her to tell him what she had in her mind. In truth, Zenocrates (said she to him) I wish you knew, but I think I have not the power to tell you. It must be some strange thing then (answer'd he) and I fear (added this secret Lover) 'tis some artifice of Amarintha. I do not doubt (reply'd Lysimena.) But I beseech you, Madam (said Zenocrates, who is naturally very curious) tell me whether I am concern'd in that which you wish I knew. You are as much as my self (answer'd Lysimena). 'Tis then some horrid wickedness I am accused of (reply'd he) if it be, I conjure you, Madam, to believe that I am perfectly innocent. I believe so (answer'd she) and to testify so much to you (proceeded the Princess, blushing) I will at this instant resolve to acquaint you with what Meleontus has told me. I shall be oblig'd to you for it, Madam (reply'd Zenocrates) speak therefore I conjure you, and tell me exactly all that Meleontus said to you against me. He told me (answer'd Lysimena, not imagining really that Zenocrates was in love with her) that all the Court believes you have an affection for me, and that I understand it without taking it ill. I leave you to judge (added she) whether this be well-pleasing to me to hear. Ah! Madam (cry'd he) I am unhappy. No, no, Zenocrates (answer'd Lysimena) do not fear that this accident shall deprive you of my friendship; for tho I am much troubled at the rumour, yet I will not punish you for a crime which you have not committed. Alas! Madam (reply'd he) you ill interpret my words. For, in brief (added he out of a transport of love) that which causes me to account my self unhappy; is, that the whole Court knows I almost dye for love of you; and you alone are ignorant of it. Yes, Divine Princess (proceeded Zenocrates with the most passionate looks in the World) I have not power to tell you that I do not love. I acknowledge, that without this occasion, perhaps I should never have told you that I love you, and I had almost resolv'd to dye without giving you any testimonies of my affection; but finding a necessity upon me to declare my self exactly, I am too sincere, Madam, to offer to excuse my self of a crime, which I esteem glorious to commit. For in truth, Madam, the seemingly inconstant Zenocrates is the most faithful Lover that ever liv'd; and moreover, you might have observ'd that for some time ago I have chang'd my manner of acting. But

But Zenocrates (answer'd the Princess much surpriz'd) you do not consider what you speak; for if you persuade me that you are amorous of me, you hazard the losing of my friendship. Should you deprive me of your Friendship, Madam (reply'd he) you would take nothing from me that could render me happy. No, Madam, that friendship as precious as it is, can no longer content me; I am a rash person, and have desires more ambitious. Nevertheless, I promise you to keep them secret for fear of offending you. But is it possible, Zenocrates (interrupted the Princess) that there should be any truth in your words, and that you will force me to banish you? I permit you still to contradict your self (added she) for I have so tender a friendship for you, that I will do all things to preserve it. Were I assur'd to dye at this very moment (answer'd Zenocrates) I could not resolve to contradict the most certain truth in the world. But, Madam, I conjure you by that Friendship wherewith you have honor'd me, have pity upon an unhappy Friend that has lov'd you in spite of himself, that has receiv'd love into his heart under the appearances of friendship; and do not destroy him, for perhaps you would regret him after you had destroy'd him (added he sighing). But Zenocrates, reply'd Lyfimena, what can I do for you in this case without acting against my self? Is it not true, Madam (said he) that if you had not discover'd I lov'd the Princess of Syracusa, or some other person that probably could not render me happy, you would have pity'd me, comforted me, and given me Counsel? I confess it (answer'd Lyfimena). Then I beseech you (reply'd he) comfort me, and counsel the unhappy Zenocrates. He desires no more of you, he has really ceas'd being your Friend, to become your Lover; but being thereby more unhappy, does not he deserve your compassion? I know I have told you, your friendship could render me happy no longer; but however, in the deplorable condition I am, become at least my Friend, tho I am no longer yours. I promise you, Madam, to do exactly what ever you please; you shall be Mistress of all my actions, looks, and words. Suffer me therefore to love you as I am able to love you, and love me also as you ——— But what say I? (added he). No, no, Madam, I know not what I would say; and should I have said it, I should have repented of it the next moment. Hate me then, and banish me; for I see but too well, that I can never be happy. No doubt you deserve never to be so (said Lyfimena) but the interest of my Honour, requires me not to make any stir in the world, that might be to my disadvantage; therefore, Zenocrates since you desire me to act like a friend still, I counsel you to cure your self, to become inconstant again, and to get a new Mistress to morrow, to whom you may be so diligent a servant as to extinguish the unpleasant rumour Meleontus has told me of. Moreover, I forbid you ever to speak to me of your love, as you tender the enjoying the liberty to see me. But yet once more, Zenocrates, resume your accustomed manner of acting, be a servant to all the Beauties, one after another, till you find your self perfectly cured. Zenocrates endeavour'd at first to oppose this advice of Lyfimena; but the Princess becoming angry, and speaking to him with an air that intimated there was no other course to be taken but obedience, he crav'd her pardon for having resist'd her, he submitted absolutely to her pleasure, and he engag'd never to speak to her of his passion, to be cur'd of it, and to appear a Lover of some fair one of the Court. And accordingly within a few daies after, Zenocrates accusom'd himself to visit a Kinswoman of Clidamira, who is sufficiently fair. But for that he would not have the Princess suspect him of being become amorous of this Lady, he shortly after deserted her for another; and that other for a third. And thus he seem'd inconstant in the eyes of all the Court, that he might seem constant in those of Lyfimena; to whom he sufficiently testin'd by his looks, that his heart was not chang'd in reference to her, and that his constancy was imputable to her as the cause. In the mean time he suffer'd more than can be imagin'd; for he talk'd eternally of love to women whom he did not affect, and never spoke of it to the person whom alone he could love. When he made Verses, he avoyded putting any thing into them, that might particularly sure to the person for whom he pretended to compose them, because he would have the Princess attribute them all to her self. And indeed he contriv'd them so ingeniously, that without any ones observance he always accommodated them to the Princess, who having such a wit as she has, understood well enough what Zenocrates desir'd she should. But being very prudent too, she took no notice to him of any thing.

In the mean time Amerintha (who made poyson of all occurrences) perceiving she had no longer any ground to tell Meleontus that Zenocrates was amorous of Lyfimena, made divers railleries upon her, believing that Zenocrates had given over loving her as well as his other Mistresses. 'Tis true, all the world had so great respect for Lyfimena, that her railleries were ill taken, and serv'd onely to manifest her malice. As for Meleontus, he no longer knew whom to accuse as the cause of Lyfimena's aversion, and continued to serve her out with much assiduousness, omitting nothing that might please her. His magnificence was conspicuous in all things, she had more divertisement than she desir'd, and he visited her continually: but being of a violent and unequal temper, he sometimes spoke to her with extraordinary submissiveness, and sometimes imperiously, relying upon the Prince's favour, who still continued his Courtship to Amerintha, tho she was not much more faithful to him than another; for an humourous woman can never be determin'd to any person, how much soever it concerns her to be so.

But the Princess having honoured me already with a tender affection, made me privy to all that befel her; she declar'd to me her aversion for Meleontus and Zenocrates's love to her self, with the new cause of his inconstancy. About this time Zenocrates finding scarce any Lady in the Court to whom he had not made some professions of devotion, was a little longer servant to a Kinswoman of Amerintha than he had been to all others. Which Lyfimena observing, spoke to me one day concerning it, after a manner that evidenc'd to me she had a greater kindness for him than she imagin'd. But before I tell you what she said to me thereupon, I must describe the place to you, where she spoke of it, because 'tis something pertinent to my discourse, and because I naturally love Gardens so well, that I cannot resolve to mention them meerly by the way. Wherefore as I willingly use to make some stay in traversing a Garden, so my mind as readily stays to describe a handsome place when I have occasion to speak something of any such. Know then then, that there's a man at Leontium called Adimantus, who is lookt upon as a very happy man. His Lineage is noble; when he was young he was handsome, and well-shap'd, dextrous at all things, very prudent in all affairs: he takes in hand; at present he is of a great age, but has a comely stature still, and a very noble and becoming aspect. He has riches even in abundance, as perfect health as a young man, inclinations to love pleasures, and wherewith to enjoy them, a Wife handsome and prudent, many good and ingenious children, and amongst the rest an elder Son, who is known and esteem'd by the whole Court. He has likewise a Daughter, whom I account handsomer than Amerintha, tho' Amerintha is one of the handsomest persons in the world, but with this difference, that she I speak of has as much wisdom as beauty, and the other yields in virtue almost to those that have the least; Moreover, Adimantus is happy too in the Wives of his Children, and I know one of them that has a pretty agreeable and delicate air which renders her infinitely lovely. But Adimantus being a prudent man in his pleasures, he took care in the beginning of his life to chuse such as might last him till death. To which purpose beyond one of the Suburbs of Leontium, he has a garden that is one of the most handsome and delightful in the World, and it is made use of to walk in by all people of Quality in Leontium, of either Sex; for Adimantus, who is of a magnificent inclination, permits free entrance to all Persons of Condition. The way that leads to it is plain and not long; there are certain Walks before the Gate, the Architecture of which is not curious, but sufficiently handsome. The first entrance is into a fair Court, which has in the upper end a large Balustrade of Iron; beyond which is seen a spacious and stately Garden-Plot, with a goodly fountain in the middle, and beyond that a long Walk, which endeth in a great Arch'd-Porch, where there is a gate made with grates. Through which one may see another Walk which reaches to a little Terras, from whence is a prospect of all the Country about, and of part of Leontium at a distance. But the better to describe this excellent place, you must know, that on the right and left sides of the Gate that enters into the Court, there are two other grated ones, which open into two Courts separated from the first. On each side are Pavilions both alike, of handsome structure, the apartments of which are no less comely than convenient. The first Balustrade I spoke of, being pass'd, and two little green plats inclos'd with small pillars of Marble being cross'd, upon which are seen sundry Garden-plots with embossed and carved work, you enter into a spacious Plot border'd about with Pyramidal Cypresses, and having a fountain in the midst. Which being pass'd over into a Walk beyond, there is a concourse of eight large and very pleasant Walks, and there is one that lies on the left hand, the whole length of the Garden, which is admirably handsome. But to the end Adimantus might leave more freedom to those that walk there, and have more himself; you must know, he has several Walks that are only for his own use. Beyond the Grated gate which is at the end of the great Walk, there is the Terras I spoke of, very pleasant Vines, and a handsome Orchard. On the other side there is also another spacious Orchard, which is only for himself; there is a particular Garden for Orange-trees, wherein are seen the rarest Flowers and Plants in the World. So that in all seasons, admirable Fruits and Flowers are found in this delicious place: many times there is Musick there, and almost continually good Company. But to come to the place which belongs to my Story, you must know, that descending from this fair Garden, there is a long walk enclos'd with quicksets which has two Banquetting-Houses at the two ends, on the one side whereof along the wall, and on the other side along the Hedge, are the goodliest Fruit-trees that ever were seen. The Pavillion that is toward the Terras serves only for shelter from the Sun and the rain, or to repose upon the Seats that are in it, as well as in the other two Pavilions that are in the same row. But as for that which is on the side towards the entrance, 'tis the most lovely Cabinet that ever I beheld. For, conceive, Madam, that it is square, made with a round lover roof, pav'd with Marble, having a Balustrade round about it, a Fountain spouting out in the middle, which falls into a Basin of Jasper; and that the side opposite to the Gate that opens to the end of the Walk has a great Looking-glass which augments the representations, multiplies the Fountain, and causes the Walk to be seen in what place soever one stands. So that sitting in this place, one may muse very agreeably at the purling noise and coolness of the water, which also makes divers agreeable and diverting Figures when you please. In this place it was that the Princess Lysimene going to sit one day, commanded me to follow her, whilst all the rest that attended her remain'd in the walk. The Princess was sometimes weary with walking, and at first intended only to enter in and sit down a while in this Cabinet. As for me, I plac'd my self at her feet upon a square stone which I found there by chance. She had not long been there, but she began to speak to me concerning Zenocrates, and ask me if I believ'd he was become constant, and lov'd Andromira's Kinswoman in good earnest. But, Madam (said I to her) you are not sufficiently considerate in speaking as you do; for if Zenocrates were become constant, to her you speak of, he must necessarily be inconstant to you. Ah! Amiclea (answer'd she blushing) it cannot be call'd inconstancy when a person alters his mind towards one that is not willing to be lov'd. For my part (said I to her smiling) I conceive that he that ceases to love one that is not willing to be lov'd, he may alwaies be call'd inconstant. If your opinion be true (answer'd she, blushing again) then Zenocrates is really inconstant; for I confess I would not that he should hate me. Then you are willing, Madam (reply'd I) that he should love you; for not to flatter your self, you must not think to be eternally lov'd without your consenting to it, and perhaps not without loving too. But, Amiclea (said Lysimene) the inclination I have for Zenocrates is certainly no more but Friendship. For my part, Madam (answer'd I smiling) I have thought long since, that when one has Friendship for an agreeable Lover, it wants not much to turn it into Love. For, confess the truth, Madam; you would not like that Zenocrates should have a violent passion, for any other. I acknowledge it (reply'd the Princess)

cess) but 'tis only because I think a great Friendship cannot consist at the same time in the heart with an ardent Love. But, Madam (said I) that which you say does not well suite with the case of Zenocrates, for you know he is possess'd with Love. Sincerely (answer'd Lyfimena, turning away her head a little) I will not name his affection so; and besides, if he continues so diligent a Courtship to Andromira's Kinswoman, I believe in a short time he will have neither Love nor Friendship for any other person; and she will wholly engross his heart. 'Tis not (added she) that this ought very much to displease me, for I would not have given the least hope to Zenocrates, but out of a humor I am not Mistress of; I could be willing he would alwayes consider me more than all the rest of the World. As the Princess was speaking this, she lift up her head, thinking she heard some noise about the pay'd steps which lie round about the Cabinet. And it happened that she saw Zenocrates leaning upon the Balustrade, who being there when we enter'd into the Cabinet, durst not shew himself, because the Princess immediately began to speak of him. Lyfimena, perceiving him, made a great shriek, which causing me to look on that side her eyes turn'd, I beheld Zenocrates almost as much surpris'd as Lyfimena. Yet he recollected himself in a little space, and descending with extreme diligence, came to cast himself upon his knees before the Princess, before she could resolve what to doe: I beseech you, Madam (said he to her) pardon me a crime which Chance and Love have caus'd me to commit; I would not speak in these terms before Amiclea, if I had not understood from your own mouth and hers, that you have told her something concerning the passion which I have for you, and the indifference which you have towards me. Zenocrates (answer'd Lyfimena hastily) you are not indifferent to me, for I had a Friendship for you a quarter of an hour agoe, but at present I find that I am going to hate you horribly. Was there ever any boldness equal to yours (proceeded she) to dare to hear what I speak in secret to Amiclea? Alas! Madam (reply'd Zenocrates) if you knew how it came to pass, you will find that I am innocent. I conceive, Madam (said I to the Princess) no person ought to be condemn'd without being first heard, and therefore you may please to give Zenocrates the hearing. If I thought he could justify himself (answer'd Lyfimena) I would forbid him to speak; but being perswaded, the more he speaks, the more criminal he will appear, I permit him to say what he will. I shall tell you then Madam (said he to her) that I am an unfortunate person. That's not the thing I would have you tell me (interrupted she) but only what you came hither for. I came hither to entertain my self, with thinking upon you, Madam (reply'd Zenocrates) at a time wherein I could not be with you with liberty to entertain you alone. But to think of me (said the Princess) it was not necessary for you to be alone. I acknowledge 'it, Madam (answer'd he) but having purposed to write something in my Tablets, with intention to cause you to read it, I made choice of the place of greatest solitude; and if you please to see whether I speak true, give yourself the trouble to read what I was writing when you came hither. At first the Princess refus'd to read what Zenocrates had written, but at last she took the Tablets, and therein found these words:

Will you never go farther than Friendship, incomparable Lyfimena? and these fair eyes which have excited so great Love in me, will they never behold me with compassion? I have promis'd you, Madam, not to speak of Love to you, but I have not promis'd you, not to write to you of it; and indeed tho I had sworn it, the torments which I suffer would dispense with me for my Oaths. Consider therefore seriously, Madam, what you would have become of me, for —

The Princess blusht as she read what I have repeated to you; after which, beginning to speak, If you think to justify your self by this (said she to Zenocrates) you are extremely deceiv'd. I pretend only (answer'd he, to prove to you that I came hither for no other reason but to meditate of you. But when you saw me (said she) Why did not you come down? Why did you not go forth? Or at least, why did not you shew your self? When I saw you, Madam (answer'd he) I thought of no more but seeing you; but presently after I heard my self nam'd, and Love making me curious, I hearkn'd what you said concerning me; and after that, respect caus'd me to stay where I was; and the fear to displease you, constrain'd me not to change my place. This, Madam, is the cause of my Crime; nevertheless, I am sufficiently punished for my rash curiosity, for I have heard nothing that I can draw to my advantage. Ha! Zenocrates (reply'd she) you are better pleas'd with me than you signify, but I am so angry both with my self and you, that I will punish both of us alike; and therefore I resolve to deprive my self of a Friend, and you of a Mistress. Go, leave Leontium for some time (said she to him) go to Herbasa, whither your affairs call you; and if it be true that Andromira's Kinswoman has not laid very powerful chains upon you, every place will afford you objects of consolation. Ah! Madam (cry'd he) you are too cruel: No, no, you shall never banish me so easily; and as for the reproaches you make me, I will soon put an end to them; I will never more see the person you speak of; and if it be still your pleasure that I should counterfeit being a Lover to hide the passion I have for you, I promise you never to serve one and the same person above eight dayes, but to appear so inconstant for the future, that your self shall never have reason to doubt of my constancie. Yet Zenocrates could not prevail at all with this discourse, nor make his peace all that day. Lyfimena went away without granting him pardon, and we left Zenocrates in that place so pale, sad, and so afflicted, that I was moved with his discontent. And so was Lyfimena too as well as I, and more; but she endeavour'd to hide her sentiments from me, and counterfeited pleasantness the rest of the day. Nevertheless, Zenocrates made good his word, he gave over courting Andromira's kinswoman, and seem'd so chang'd, that he was constrain'd to pretend he was sick. But, in fine what cannot the constancie of a deserving person doe, when he knows well how to improve all opportunities fortune presents him with, and the aversion his Mistress has for his Rival? Lyfimena at length found that she lov'd Zenocrates more than she thought she did; she permitted him to adore her, and acknowledg'd to him that if her fortune would permit it, she should account her self happy in being able to make him so. Moreover, she had this advantage, that the Princess her Mother favour'd Zenocrates. Yet

after all, she took from him all hope of being happy, and promis'd him only to continue her resistance to the Prince her Brother, when he interceded for Meleontus. After this Zenocrates's life was pleasant enough, for tho he was not permitted to hope, yet he did not cease to doe so. But to the end not to give occasion to Meleontus or Amerintha to trouble their innocent affection, he still seem'd the most inconstant man in the world, and he counterfeited so exquisitely, that the two persons who had such extraordinary subtilty in the discerning the most ingenious artihces, were deceiv'd in this occasion. But that which was remarkable in this Adventure was, that the Princess her self was many times deceiv'd, by believing that Zenocrates was really inconstant. 'Tis true, 'twas easie for him to justify himself; for he offer'd Lyfimena to visite none but her self, to converse with no other, and to renounce all the rest of the world, and all kind of interests and considerations, if she requir'd it. So that notwithstanding the disgust Meleontus's love gave her, Lyfimena enjoy'd some agreeable moments. The Princess her Mother hated Meleontus and loved Zenocrates. She found in this agreeable Lover, submissiveness, respect, wit, and constancie; and to render all this more sweet, their affection was so secret, that none of the Court imagin'd there was any thing more than a bare friendship between them. Yet oftentimes they had little Quarrels, not only because Lyfimena suspected he took delight in being inconstant and counterfeiting too well; but also because Zenocrates, being naturally a little subject to distrust, he had now and then a causeless fear that Lyfimena would at length suffer her heart to be touch'd with Meleontus's passion. But however, these small fallings out serving only to invigorate the dearness of their affection, they were not much to be pity'd. Yet the Princess did not tell Zenocrates she lov'd him, but so agreeably suffer'd him to love her, that he told it to himself. As for Meleontus, he made many splendid and costly entertainments; but Zenocrates with less these made gallantries that more affected Lyfimena's heart. I remember one day amongst the rest, Zenocrates thought himself of a thing sufficiently gallant, which I shall tell you by and by; but first you must know there was at that time a man of Quality of Syracusa at Leontium, a great Friend of the Princess, and that deservedly, being a person of no ordinary merit.

I beseech you, dear Amiclea (interrupted Plotina) make us know a man whom you believe worthy to be Lyfimena's Friend; for, for my part, I love much to judge of people by their Friends. I am much of Plotina's humor in this (said Valeria) and I know Clelia is so too.

Since 'tis so (said Amiclea) it will be easie for me to satisfy you; besides, I must confess to you, it was hard for me to resolve to mention this illustrious friend of Lyfimena without commending him. Know then, Theander is a man of Quality, whose Character is so particular, that 'tis not easie to describe it well. He is tall, of a goodly shape and noble Port; his aspect is extreme graceful, and there is a certain air in his whole Person, that denotes part of his nature, and promises with sincerity, and goodness. He has a large rising Nose, his Visage is somewhat long, his Eyes are sufficiently little, but so sweet and smiling, that 'tis easily seen his heart is sensible of pleasures. His action is careless enough; his hair is of a good length; and sometimes he uses so sprightly a Silence, that 'tis manifest he hears nothing but what he understands most throughly, and of which many times he is able to speak better than those he hears. And indeed, Theander has a great natural wit, which he has so carefully improv'd, that there are scarce any Sciences in nature he is not capable of. When he is amongst some of the Disciples of the wise Thales, Democritus, Hippocrates, or Pythagoras, he makes it known that he is perfectly skill'd in all the Secrets of Nature, and that Philosophy has nothing conceal'd from him. If he be amongst such as love polite learning, and especially Poetry, he is of so exquisite a judgement, that (as I have heard from intelligent Persons) he understands all the excellencies and all the defects of Homer and Hesiod; and if he should undertake to compose an Heroick Poem, he would doe it according to all the rules that the most accurate Masters have given for such works. He is a curious examiner of all the graces of Poetry, and accurate as to the defects that are found in most Verses; yet his Criticalness is without inhumanity: he excuses small faults in handsome Composures, and never condemns any thing unjustly. He speaks with facility and exactness, and when he pleases, he writes Letters of a certain pleasing strain, peculiar to himself. Moreover, Theander is grave and something melancholy; but his melancholy is serene, and easily admits of joy. For he loves pleasures and seeks them; but he seeks them without ostentation, he loves to chuse them his own way, and not to divert himself with the multitude. He has a sincere and upright heart, a firm and generous Soul; he looks upon ambition as a passion which he has overcome, and the Victory over which has establish'd the quiet of his life. By this means he is free from the cares that possess such as desire to advance their fortunes; he is content with his own, which indeed is sufficiently good, and he enjoys it peaceably in the midst of the tumult of a great Court, where he is not interess'd in any thing that might disturb his pleasures. Furthermore, Theander is indu'd with an heroical Courage, whereof he has given very eminent proofs in several occasions; he hath been seen to break through an Enemy Army, that he might put himself into a Besieged place, and at another time to pass almost alone through an Enemy Country to get to an Army, and be present at some dangerous enterprize. But the Valour of Theander has alwayes been without vanity, and he has more car'd to assure himself of his own heart, than to attract applauses which he values not. His indifference in respect of this kind of glory is so much the more commendable, in that his heart is not otherwise indifferent. For he loves his friends very tenderly and generously, and is much lov'd by them; and that which is very glorious to him, he has a great number of illustrious ones. But besides, Theander has the best temper'd mind in the world, and as he is not capable to regulate his own sentiments by those of others, so he does not oblige others to follow his: By means of which candor, he has friends whose Maxims are absolutely contrary to his, with whom nevertheless, he converses with great kindness. His Soul is indu'd with sweetness, equity, tenderness, and humanity. He is much mov'd with worth and virtue; he loves liberty above all things, and places supreme felicity in contentment, Of which never to endanger the loss, he has renounc'd the love of all that is troublesome and painful. He loves handsome Objects in general, but no particular one is able to confine him so far as to render him unhappy; so that love is rather ther a naked delight in his heart, than a passion. A young Shepherdess pleases him with her graceful simplicity, more than a Princess with excessive magnificence. Novelty likewise has some influence upon him, and variety in certain things, as much delights his Eyes, as it does all the World in the Flowers of a Meadow. He loves also to be fully inform'd of certain weakneses of which the Wisest are sometimes capable, and sometimes he makes to himself pleasures of curiositie, which are not common to all the World. The famous Rhodopis has had nothing so private in her life, but he knows it; and drawing divertisement out of the follies of others, he is much delighted to understand them. As for women, in reference to his Friendship, he finds few worthy of it; but when he meets with any one of a prudent and agreeable wit, and of a firm and free heart, he places her in the rank of his Friends; being far from their injustice who believe it is impossible there should be any woman capable of a rational converse. Theander was never dazzled with Grandeur, and he knows so well how to abstract things from that which is extrinsecal to them, that nothing ever deceives him. He has also a facility peculiar to himself, for he is often seen to walk alone, because he has lent out his Equipage. Yet he does not lend out these kind of things out of the thought to be repaid in the same nature, for many times he does it to persons that are unable to render him the like office. Moreover, he has a little Galliot upon a river that runs at the foot of a house of his upon the Bank of Himera, which serves his own convenience less than that of others; for even to strangers that desire it, he willingly lends it, provided they be fair; and so it goes to and fro continually without being almost ever employ'd in his own service. Nor is it material whether such strangers be Persons of Quality, or no: Beauty is sufficient in this case; and be they but only young, yet the Galliot shall not be deny'd them. In a word, Theander is indu'd with vertue advantageous both to himself and others, which renders him very acceptable, and is undoubtedly very expedient to the felicity of his life; for being free from all the tumultuousness of the world, and the passions, he affects nothing but what suits with his own Genius, and consequently finds himself less expos'd than other men to all the misfortunes of life; because vertue alone suffices to render him happy; and never seeking any good but such as is attainable, he never employs his time unprofitably to himself. Thus you see what a Person the illustrious Friend of Lyfimena is, who was at Leontium when matters stood in the posture I have related. About that time Lyfimena made a short journey of pleasure to a house belonging to the Father of an intimate Friend of Theander, who is a person of no ordinary merit. Amerintha was one of the Company, and so was Andromira; Meleontus and Zenocrates took care not to fail to be there, and indeed nothing render'd this appointment less agreeable to Lyfimena, than the too good Company. For Amerintha's charms, and Meleontus's merit were sufficiently troublesome to her. The place design'd to goe to, being wonderfully delightful, afforded no small pleasure at the first arrival. For not to mention the fore-Court which is handsome and stately, the Arch'd-walk which is on the right side of the entrance, and gives an excellent prospect over a spacious part of the Country, till the light loses it self; the two large Banqueting-houses, which are at the Corners of the Court; the Statues which standing niches in several places of the front of the building, the Symmetry of which is exact, stately, and agreeable; the lofty Cupulo that arises out of the middle of it; the magnificence of the Porch, with the number of its Pilasters and Pillars; the ornaments of the Stairs and several Appartments; the Cabinet out of which are divers handsome prospects; nor the excellent Pictures which are seen in all places, 'tis sufficient to tell you, that there is a Hall in this stately House, whose greatness, form, carv'd work, Pictures, and Ornaments astonish all that enter into it, tho the outside gave them an expectation of seeing nothing but what is excellent. It is no improbable conjecture, that this Hall was built by one of those Kings of Egypt, who erected the famous Pyramids; and indeed the Structure represents no ordinary Magnificence. But this is not the only admirable thing in this place; for there is a Garden which is one of the greatest that ever was seen; it is rais'd after the manner of a Terrace; in the middle is an admirable fountain; and notwithstanding the place is very high, and discovers a great compass of the Country, to the great delectation of the sight, yet 'tis not perceiv'd that there is a River beyond it, tho it serves very much to augment the agreeableness of the place. On the other side of this Garden is seen below, a Meadow and a very large Pond; and the Park being very spacious, and the wayes of it unequal, the Prospects of it are also very different; so that it is very delightful to goe about it in a Chariot. 'Twas to this place (which is called Erycina, because in its rais'd situation it something resembles the Temple that stands upon Mount Eryx) that Lyfimena desir'd to goe: but Meleontus having been the proposer of the design, was the Person that gave a magnificent Collation. Yet it was an unhappy time for him, for Lyfimena was more offended when he did things well, than when he did them ill; so that this day her mind was in a very bad temper; for all the service was admirable the Musick excellent, and Meleontus's deportment all the day both in actions and words very noble and generous. As they were sitting in the stately Porch (which was cooler than any other place) he acquitted himself very handsomely of a discourse, which by reason of his own concernment in it was not a little perplexing. For after several things transiently spoken of, it came to be ask'd, Whether benefits produc'd Friendship, rather than Friendship it self, or great desert without benefits. I assure you (said Lyfimena thereupon) that benefits alone produce no great dearness in the hearts of most people; for usually the remembrance of benefits wears out of their minds, as grief does out of the hearts of afflicted persons, from whence, every moment steals a part. So that time weakens and diminishes gratitude, as well as it does affliction. 'Tis true, Madam, in ingrateful minds (answer'd Meleontus), but not in such as are generous, which are alwayes grateful. For my part (reply'd Zenocrates) tho I am not ungrateful, and will never be so, yet I conceive that if I received benefits from a Person without merit, the friendship I should bear him would be more in my will than in my heart. But, if benefits without merit (said Amerintha) cannot produce Friendship, doe you think that friendship without merit can produce a very tender one? and doe you think that desert alone without friendship and benefits is able to beget a great affection? In truth (said Andromira) if friendship be not joyn'd with desert and benefits, those latter will have no great effect. But how can we doe otherwise (said Meleontus) than love those that serve us and doe us good upon all occasions? And how can we but love such too (said Amerintha) as love us very ardently? Many times (answer'd Zenocrates) they that are so officious, doe it out of Vanity, and not out of any honest principle; wherefore, provided we publish their good deeds and be ready to return the like in case of need, I conceive we may dispense with loving them, and yet not be ingrateful. For friendship and gratitude are two different things; and I think we ought to have the latter towards all, from whom we receive benefits, and the former only for those that affect our heart either by their deserts, or their friendship, or by reason of our own inclination. But will you love People of no merit (said Amerintha) because they love you? and is it not just to love those that doe you services? For my part (said Lyfimena) if I were to love people of little merit, I should think my self more oblig'd to love such as lov'd me, than such as serv'd me; but to speak sincerely, Friendship not depending upon our Wills, 'tis in vain to dispute of a thing that is not in our power; and all that can rationally be said in this case, is, That desert alone produces esteem only, which is alwayes a great disposition to friendship; That benefits ought insensibly to ingage the receivers to their interests from whom they receive them, and at least beget a kind of gratitude in their minds, the effects whereof resemble those of friendship: but as for friendship singly without desert and benefit, I conceive 'tis sufficient to have a complacencie and pity towards such as bear it; for to ingage to love all people without merit, of whom we may be lov'd, would be injurious to our true friends. All which you say is extremely ingenious, Madam (answer'd Meleontus) but I know services and merit are of no account with you, unless your own inclination set a value upon them. So that, Madam, for the obtaining of your love, it is necessary to seek rather to please you, than to serve you; but the mischief is, 'tis more difficult to be agreeable to you than to render you service. I acknowledge it (reply'd she rising up) but I conceive all the world is of the same mind, and so I am not to be blam'd for it. Meleontus was no doubt dejected as he observ'd the aspect wherewith the Princess answer'd him; but he dissembled it, tho his discontent was extreme violent. Upon which the Princess, notwithstanding her aversion for him, could not but judge that he acted like an honest man; which she being vex'd at, and perceiving Zenocrates took no notice of nor determin'd to be melancholy this day as well as her self, the debonaire humor of Zenocrates disgusted her nice mind; so that when he approach'd to her in the walk to speak to her apart, she frown'd upon him, and told him he lov'd her so little, that he was not displeas'd to see that Meleontus deportment was extraordinary commendable. I confess it, Madam (answer'd Zenocrates wholly surpris'd) that I did not think of being discontented, because the Musick was good, and the Collation magnificent; but I am so at present with the commendations which you give my Rival. Ha: Zenocrates (said she to him, as she went from him) I will not thank you for the indignation which I have by force excited in your heart. After this she call'd Amerintha, that she might not be alone with him; so that the conversation became general all the rest of the day, Zenocrates not having opportunity to speak one word in private. Lyfimena, to avoy'd it, propos'd it to consideration, Whether it is more pleasing to be very lovely without being much lov'd, than to be much lov'd without being amiable. But after every one had spoke their Reasons, it was concluded, That 'tis better to deserve to be lov'd and not to be so, than to be lov'd without desert; yet it was granted, that whereas usually people desire to be lovely, chiefly that they may be lov'd, it is more pleasure to be lov'd than to be barely lovely; because instead of receiving of contentment thereby, the lovely person is disgusted with living amongst people that understand not to doe justice to desert. But at length night approaching, preparation was made to return to Leontium. Which returning was with sufficient melancholy; Lyfimena was pensive, Meleontus dejected, Zenocrates sad, Amerintha vexed, and they proceeded in the way after a silent manner; when by chance a young Hart coming from amongst the bushes, a Greyhound that follow'd one of Meleontus Attendants, gave chase to him in the plain. Which unexpected Adventure causing the Ladies that were on the same side to give a great cry, Amerintha would oblige Lyfimena who was on the other, to turn her head to see the young Hart running swiftly upon the Plain. But the Princess was in so deep a muse, that not being willing to break it off, she told Amerintha carelessly, she would not see the chase unless it came on her side, without taking the pains to turn her self. She had no sooner spoke this, but the young Hart chancing to see people coming towards him in the Plain, turn'd short, and passing before the heads of the Horses of Lyfimena's Chariot, came so near her, that it seem'd to those that heard what she said just before, to happen by some enchantment. Lyfimena being agreeably surpris'd with this Accident, could not hinder her self from taking pleasure in beholding this casual divertisement. But it lasted not long; for by this time it was grown late, so that both the Hart and the Dog were soon lost out of sight. And in fine, the night sav'd the Young Harts life, and the Dog returned to his Master before we got to Leontium. Zenocrates knowing well enough how to improve all occasions, remember'd he had seen at the House of one of his intimate Friends, a Young tame Hart. Wherefore he went and requested it, and having caus'd a silver collar to be put about its neck engraven with the Characters of the Princess, the next day at noon he sent it to her with the most pleasant Verses in the world. He feign'd that the young Hart speaking to Lyfimena, told her ingenious things, which bearing a double sense had reference both to the condition of Zenocrates and his unhappiness in displeasing the Princess that day.

But doe not you remember the Verses upon the young Hart? (interrupted Plotina). If I had remember'd them (answer'd Amiclea) I would have repeated them but all I can say of them is that they began thus,

*I, like a young Actæon follow you,
Happy Diana, with too rash a view.*

And after divers ingenious fancies they concluded thus
*But if, for having seen your charms, I dye;
No sighs, no tears shall wail my destiny.*

I am very sorry I cannot recite more of them to you, but I must be contented with telling you, that this gallantry extremely pleas'd Lyfimena; she accepted the Hart with pleasure, pardon'd Zenocrates, and obligingly answer'd the Verses he had made, in the name of the young Hart, which in a short time became one of

of her chief divertisements. For she put it into one of the Gardens of the Palace, where it grew so familiar and amiable, that almost every one made much of it, to please Lysimena. And it was so proud of the caresses made to it, that contrary to the Nature of Stags, it became valiant, and was oftentimes seen not only to hold the Dogs at Bay, but to go towards them and force them to fly. A few days after this gallantry, Zenocrates made another; the Princess having purposed to go very early in the morning to offer Sacrifice in a Temple a good distance from Leontium, would not be follow'd by any besides her own Attendants. Zenocrates not being able to endure that the Princess should continue from morning to night without hearing of him, gain'd an interest in one of her waiting-women, and gave her three Letters to deliver to her at several hours of the day. And accordingly there being none but this Virgin and I in her Chariot, as soon as we were out of the City, she being of a debonaire humour, and well beloved by the Princess, gave her the first Letter, telling her she receiv'd it a little before they set forth. Being Zenocrates us'd to write to her often, she was not surpris'd at this first Letter, but took it, and opening it, requir'd me to read it at the same time with her; and we found it to contain these very words:

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

IT seems Madam, you intend to spend a whole day without thinking of those that think of none but you, and you believe you cannot be constrain'd to think of them whether you will or no. But you shall see, before the day be past, that they who know how to love, find inventions, which indifferent persons never think of.

After this Letter was read, Lysimena imagin'd Zenocrates thought it would be sufficient to oblige her to think of him all the day; but she was much surpris'd four hours after, when she saw one of her slaves (whom this waiting-woman of the Princess had so instructed) deliver her a second Letter from Zenocrates. She open'd it with more haste than the former, and found that in it which I am going to repeat to you.

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

PERhaps you believe, Madam, it is but four hours since you departed from hence, but I swear to you I judge them to be four Ages. For a moment of discontent, and that caused by absence, seems so long to a Lover, that he may be allowed to reckon it for more than a year. In the meantime you account moments but for moments, and hours for hours. But if you employ'd them in thinking of the constancy of the inconstant Zenocrates, it would be something; but you seem to mind nothing but Trees, the Meadows, and the Mountains which you see, whilst I am wholly taken up in thinking of your Charms, your Wit, and my own unhappiness.

Well, Madam, (said I to Lysimena) what say you to Zenocrates's Gallantry? I say (answer'd she) that he diverts himself at my cost; for I told him yesterday, I would not remember him all the day, but would only think of the Sacrifice I went to offer. Nevertheless, he endeavours to force me to think of him. After which Lysimena reprov'd the waiting-woman that was with her; but she did it so weakly, that it was apparent she was not much sorry for being deceiv'd. A little while after we arriv'd at the Temple, the Sacrifice was offer'd, and we went to the Priests house where the Princess was to dine; but before that, an unknown person, whom the same waiting-woman found in that place, deliver'd a third Letter to Lysimena, who being now accustom'd to receive them, took it smilingly, and drawing me aside. It must be confess'd (said she) Zenocrates is not too wise. You have more reason (answer'd I) to say Zenocrates is an ingenious person and of good invention. After this she open'd the third Letter, which, if I am not mistaken, was in these terms.

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

PERhaps you think, Madam, you are so remote from me, that I cannot trouble you, but know, that should you go to the Worlds end, my love would follow you every where; and in whatever part of the Earth you were, I should devise some invention to make you know that I am the most ardent Lover amongst mankind.

At least (said the Princess after she had read the Letter) Zenocrates is the most happy, in's having to do with a person that is not offended with his follies. After which we spoke very obligingly of him, for a quarter of an hour, and laugh'd sufficiently at this Gallantry; which was so much the more ingenious, for that Lysimena durst not refuse the Letters that were presented to her, for fear of causing suspicion in her attendants; besides, their affection being only innocent, there was no reason for it. At length we departed from the Temple, and put our selves upon the way to Leontium. But when we were gone half way, a man on Horse-back approaching Lysimena's Chariot, deliver'd her a fourth Letter; after which he retir'd, and the Princess, having open'd it, found it contain these words:

ZENOCRATES to LYSIMENA.

IF you believe absence to be a remedy of love, you are extremely deceived, Madam; for since your departure, methinks I love you more by half. Yet I lov'd you yesterday more than ever any person loved, and I am confident I have surpass'd myself alone, in loving you more than I did. You see, Madam, that against your will you have been constrained to think four times this day upon the unhappy Zenocrates. I beseech you force him no more to have recourse to the same Artifices; think upon him sometimes voluntarily, that he may be obliged to you for it; and, if it be possible, make a pleasure to your self of the most constant and respectful passion that ever was: for tho I can force you to think upon me, yet I find that I cannot constrain you to love me, and that without you I shall always be the most miserable person in the World.

This

This fourth Letter being read, Zenocrates attain'd the end he propounded to himself: for as long as the rest of the way lasted, we talk'd of nothing but him; and when we drew near to Leontium, we beheld him coming forth on purpose to meet the Princess upon one of the handsomest Horses in the World. But he had time onely to make a reverence and speak four or five words to her; because the Prince and Meleontus returning from hunting, appear'd and came to us. Now observe how matters stood at this time the Prince of Leontium lov'd Amerintha who out of a design of interest countenanc'd him; Amerintha was officious to serve Meleontus to the uttermost of her power for the same reason, and because she knew it was a way to prejudice Lyfimena. Meleontus lov'd without being lov'd again; Zenocrates appear'd inconstant, that he might be faithful to Lyfimena; and the Princess loving Zenocrates more than she imagin'd, very patiently endur'd the pretensions of Meleontus, but agreeably cherish'd the affection of Zenocrates, tho she did no more than suffer her self to be lov'd by him in secret. At this time, the Princess of Leontium, Lyfimena's Mother, went to spend a month at a fair house of her own in the Country, whither the Prince went sometimes to visit her; but no persons durst go thither without him, because she had signified she would be there in solitude. So that Meleontus and Zenocrates did not see Lyfimena, but when the Prince went to visit the Princess his Mother. As for me, I had the happiness to follow Lyfimena in this little journey, which was very agreeable to me, I had more time to converse with her than at Leontium; and knowing all the secrets of her heart, I was her comforter in her discontents. Being she knew Amerintha's vigilant subtlety, she prohibited Zenocrates to write to her so often as he wish'd, for fear any of his Letters might be lost, and cause some great unhappiness to them. Whilst we were in this retirement, the idleness of the Country occasioning the invention of pleasures which otherwise would not be thought of, the Princess one evening resolv'd to go abroad on Horse-back, followed onely by two of her waiting-women and myself, into a spacious Meadow which has a River on one side, and a Wood on the other, and she was attended by no more than four or five Slaves. We were no sooner come into that place, but we beheld six Horsemen issuing forth of the Wood, who approach'd towards us, and seem'd to have a purpose to rob the Princess of the Jewel she was adorn'd with this day, or else to carry her away; for their grim looks caus'd us to believe they had no good design. This surprising sight astonish'd the Princess; for having none but Slaves about her, who being without Arms betook themselves to their heels, she was in great fear lest some hard Adventure should befall her. But at the same instant we saw appear at another place of the Wood, a man on Horse-back, young and admirably handsome, follow'd by three others that seem'd to be his Attendants; he observing the aspect and action of the Robbers, and the air and equipage of the Princess, did not demur a moment what to do, but drawing his sword courageously, cast himself between Lyfimena and the Thieves. This valiant action no doubt surpris'd those that intended to set upon us, but it did not cause them to fly. For being inrag'd at it, they endeavour'd to encompass and kill our succourer; but he taught them to their cost that his valour was more redoubtable than theirs. At first they kill'd one of his followers, but a moment after he kill'd two of theirs, wounded three, and beat them back into the Wood. After which coming to Lyfimena with much civility, he offer'd her to accompany her whither she pleas'd. You may judge with how obliging an air, the Princess receiv'd this gallant stranger. Whosoever you are (answer'd she) I promise you my friendship as long as I live; for the service you have done me is so considerable, that I will not expect till I am oblig'd to grant it to you out of the gratitude I have for your merit. That which you say, is so obliging (reply'd the valiant Stranger) that I account myself too highly rewarded: yet I assure you (added he) I have reason to hope you will not repent of what you have promis'd me, when you know me more particularly: and I assure you too, you shall soon know there is no vanity in speaking as I do. After this Lyfimena took the way towards the Castle, where the Princess of Leontium being inform'd of what had pass'd, receiv'd the Stranger with very high civilities. As soon as she beheld him, she felt an extraordinary commotion in her heart, and lookt upon him with pleasure and attention; she imagin'd she had formerly seen some person that resembled him, and could not contain from sighing as she consider'd him: I beseech you (said she to him) generous Stranger, satisfy me whence you came. I come at present from Phenicia, Madam (answer'd he). But were you born in that Country? (demanded she) and who taught you so well the Language of this? That's a secret, Madam (answer'd he) which I cannot tell but in private, and I am extremely desirous to inform you of it. Upon which the Princess led him into her Cabinet, whilst Lyfimena went to her Chamber to recover her self a while from the fright she had been in. As soon as the valiant Stranger was there, beholding her with respect. Ah! Madam (said he to her) do you not know the unfortunate Artemidorus, whom you gave life to? I was no doubt but a child when the Pyrates carried me away, but I remember so accurately all that I saw here, that whatever change time has made in my countenance, methinks 'tis easie for you to observe that I have the honour to be your Son. Ah! Artemidorus (said she, embracing him) my heart knew you sooner than my eyes; and this very moment wherein I consider you better, I behold in your Visage an indubitable proof of your words. If you doubt of it, Madam (said he to her) I shall tell you the very words you us'd to me alone in your Cabinet, when I departed with Cleanthus to go into Greece; Go, my Son (said you to me) go learn in a strange Country, how to make your self esteem'd in your own, when you return to it; and if it be possible, do not come back hither, till you can by your merit obscure that of the most worthy persons you will find here. If I could give you a more precise token of what I am, I conceive I should not have caus'd you to remember that generous command you laid upon me, because I confess to my shame I have not been able to become such as you commanded me to be. Howsoever, I can assure you, 'tis no fault of the wise Cleanthus, for he has omitted no industry to render me worthy to be your son. But where is Cleanthus? (said the Princess of Leontium) and in what places have you pass'd your lives? As for Cleanthus (answer'd he) I hope he will be here within a short time; and, as for our adventures, I will relate them to you in few words. You know, Madam, we took ship to go into Greece, and no doubt:

doubt you are not ignorant that we were made captive by Pyrates. But you never heard that they sold us to others, who carried us into Phenicia. For I that was no uncomely person in my childhood, I was bought to be presented to the Queen of that Country. But as for Cleantbus, he was sold to a Priest of the Temple of Neptune at Tire, who soon observing his wisdom and abilities, propos'd to the King of Phenicia to place him about the young Princes his sons, who are indeed the most goodly and accomplish'd Princes in the World. The eldest reigns with all imaginable glory; and the youngest is the ornament and delight of the Court. At first Cleantbus not daring to discover who I was, pretended I was his son; by which means I being restored to his governance, he had as great care of me as of the young Princes, with whom he was plac'd to teach them several accomplishments. Sometime after, thinking he had given sufficient testimonies of his honesty, and perform'd service enough to obtain what he desir'd, he confided in the King, told him my quality, and requested liberty to bring me back hither. But in this occasion the virtue and worth of Cleantbus were an invincible obstacle to his design; for the King of Phenicia, judg'd him so necessary for the education of the two young Princes, that tho he doubted not the truth of his words, yet he made semblance that he did, and told him at length that however it were, he would not give him the liberty to depart from his Court till the Princes his sons were of age to need no more instructions. The King of Phenicia sent the Princes his sons, Cleantbus and me to a very fair house, where we liv'd a long time. Afterwards we return'd to Court, but without any liberty, and liv'd there in that manner till the death of the King of Phenicia. After which the Prince his son who reigns at this day to reward Cleantbus for the services render'd him, gave him leave to bring me back hither on condition that he would return again to him. To which purpose having given us a vessel to return, we made use of it to go into Greece, to the end to follow your intention that I should see that Country. After which being embark'd at Corinth, and our ship joyning with another Merchant ship that was bound for the same place with us, it hapned unfortunately one day, that Cleantbus going one morning into that Ship to visit the Commander of it who was sick, a sudden tempest arising, seperated us in such sort, that we could never come together, or so much as see one another more; but I landed at the Port nearest to this place, where I hope Cleantbus too will in a short time arrive. Artemidorus having done speaking the Princess of Leontium made him a thousand caresses: but after this told him it was requisite to defer making this discovery to the Prince his brother until Cleantbus were arriv'd. For whereas (added she) we have different sentiments in many things, I should be glad that your acknowledgement depended not upon my testimony alone, but that Cleantbus who is reputed for a man of eminent honesty, confirm it. As you please, Madam (answer'd Artemidorus) but I remember so many particular things which my brother said to me during my childhood, that I believe he cannot have forgot them all. Believe me, Artemidorus (reply'd the Princess) do not trust to his memory, and let us wait for Cleantbus. But, Madam (said Artemidorus) if Cleantbus had suffer'd shipwreck, it would have been necessary to have dispens'd with his absence. Were that his misfortune hapned (answer'd she) we might then do all that we can do at this day. After this, Artemidorus desir'd permission of the Princess of Leontium, at least to make himself known to Lysimena; and accordingly without more delay the Princess writ three or four lines in her Tablets, which she gave Artemidorus to deliver to her. Upon which he went to find Lysimena, and beseeching her that he might speak to her without being heard by any other, the Princess withdrew into her Cabinet, where he deliver'd the Tablets to her, in which she found these words.

He that you see, is Artemidorus, who you have so often beheld me lament; love him as a good sister ought to love a brother, and discover this great secret to none.

At first Lysimena knew not whether she ought to believe what she read: but Artemidorus spoke to her after a manner so full of tenderness, that on a sudden suffering her self to be convinc'd, she embrac'd the Prince her brother with all the testimonies of joy and dearness imaginable, and express'd her self with so much the greater passion: because at that instant she look'd upon Artemidorus as a Protector that might oppose the violence the Prince her brother intended to use towards her, to constrain her to marry Meleontus. The door of her Cabinet hapning to be open, a Waiting-woman belonging to the Princess whom Meleontus had corrupted, beheld the caresses she made to Artemidorus, which nevertheless she attributed to the service which she had receiv'd from him. After which Artemidorus forbade his attendants to tell his name to any person, and liv'd as a stranger unknown in the Castle. But Lysimena who did me the honour to keep nothing secret from me, told me what had pass'd and ask'd my counsel whether she should write to Zenocrates concerning it. Because I knew Letters are liable to a thousand accidents, I told her that I counsell'd her not only not to write him word of it, but also judge it prudence not to tell him any thing of it, altho he should come thither with the Prince; and that it were better he knew it not, but with others, for fear least not being able to contain from giving some intimation of it, it might prove prejudicial to the owning of Artemidorus. And the Princess was satisfi'd with my advice. In the mean time, the rumour of the accident that had befallen her, and the succour she receiv'd from a stranger, was soon known to all the world. The Prince of Leontium being a little wounded at his last hunting could not make a visit to the Princess his sister upon this occasion, but out of favour to Meleontus, he sent him to do it: so that Zenocrates had the discontent to see his Rival go to visit Lysimena, without daring to follow him. Artemidorus being an extreme goodly personage, Meleontus no sooner beheld him but he was troubled that Lysimena had had a protector of so admirable an aspect. But this first sentiment made no great impression in him, but soon pass'd out of his mind. For he fell to extol Artemidorus, and thanked him in the name of the Prince and his own, for the assistance he had given the Princess. Artemidorus answer'd to all that Meleontus said to him with so noble and gallant an air, that this Lover of Lysimena was astonish'd at it: but he was more so, when having discours'd half a quarter of an hour in a walk of the Garden with the Waiting-woman whom he had gain'd to his interests, he understood by her that since the four days this stranger was in the Castle, he had almost continually have been in particular converse with Lysimena, or with me: she related to him also how she saw the Princess embrace him with tenderness; and told him she had never seen so great an affection in any person; that as soon as the Princess awaken'd, she sent to know of the stranger's health, that he saw her dress her self, and was in her Chamber till she was ready to go into bed. And indeed, tho' I was opinion that it was requisite to use greater dissimulation, yet Lysimena would not believe me, being secure, in that there was none but her own attendants, and those of the Princess of Leontium in the Castle. This discourse produc'd strange sentiments in Meleontus's mind, who knew not what to think of it. However he resolv'd to remove this stranger from Lysimena, and to propound it to the Princess of Leontium to conduct him to the Prince, but she told him she would do it her self when she return'd to Leontium, and that in the mean time, the stranger would expect the arrival of his Attendants and equipage in the Castle. Meleontus press'd her for some time: but perceiving it was to no purpose, he ceas'd his importunity, and return'd back with a great disposition to be jealous. At his return he open'd his heart to Amerintha, who promis'd him to come to us, and to observe all Lysimena's actions so diligently, and those of the stranger too, that she doubted not but to discover the truth. And accordingly Amerintha came to visit the Princess of Leontium upon pretext of the adventure lately befallen Lysimena: but for that some time was needful for attaining the real end she came for, she feign'd her self sick as soon as she arriv'd and stay'd four days with us. During which, having a cunning and malicious wit, she observ'd there was a great friendship between Artemidorus and Lysimena. She perceiv'd their familiarity, correspondence, and something more liberty and equality between them, than ought to be between a stranger and a Princess. Nevertheless Artemidorus very much pleas'd her, and out of a desire that nothing should escape her beauty, she did her utmost to excite him to love; but the heart of Artemidorus was not dispos'd to be wounded by her fair eyes. Besides, this Prince having understood by Lysimena that the Prince of Leontium was extremely amorous of Amerintha, he was careful to defend himself from her charms. Wherefore Amerintha, finding her allurements had not the effect she desired, imagin'd the reason of it to be because he was already amorous of Lysimena. Which exasperating her mind, she observ'd the Princess with more diligence, she put an ill construction upon all that she saw, she believ'd she beheld more than she did; and resolv'd also to report many things which she was sure she had not seen. So that at her return she told Meleontus, she found that the stranger was a very handsome and goodly personage, and was in love with Lysimena; adding moreover that she much fear'd Lysimena was so likewise with him. She related to him that she had discover'd that they were very frequently in private together, that in the morning he had liberty to enter into her Chamber, that he was there very late in the evening, that they understood one another by their looks, that they had a hundred little secrets to communicate between themselves; and she added of her own inventing, that walking in the Garden with them, at the turning of a palisade, she saw the stranger kiss Lysimena's hand without her being offended at it. You may judge what effect this relation had in the heart of Meleontus. It was such, that jealousy seizing upon his mind, and his violent nature being very prone to put him upon attempting the most important things precipitantly, he oblig'd Amerintha to inform the Prince of all that she had told to himself, promising her to do thence forward all that lay in his power to bring her to be Princess of Leontium. Amerintha (who was possess'd with ambition, envy and hatred) easily suffer'd her self to be perswaded, and related to the Prince of Leontium all that she had said to his favourite: which he no sooner heard, but he conceiv'd a violent indignation against Lysimena, and without considering upon the matter resolv'd to go speedily to the Castle where his Mother was, to the end to cause the stranger to remove from thence. And accordingly having consulted with Meleontus, they set forth about break of day, the Prince being then absolutely cur'd. He took only his guards with him and eight or nine men of quality, amongst whom Zenocrates was one, who was not without some iniquity in his breast, for the comely person, wit and valour of the stranger was highly extoll'd in the Court at that time. But as chance does very extraordinary things when Fate has determin'd to bring some surprising accident to pass; it hapned that the Princess of Leontium was gone that morning to offer a Sacrifice to Diana in a Temple about five or six miles distant from the Castle: Lysimena hapning to be a little indispos'd in the preceding night, did not accompany her, no more did Artemidorus; and I likewise remain'd at home to bear Lysimena company. But almost all the rest of the family follow'd the Princess, and there was very few persons left in the house. As soon as Lysimena was out of bed, her Woman began to attire her head; but the tresses of her hair were scarce undone, when Artemidorus enter'd into her Chamber to shew her a Letter from the wife Cleantus which he had newly receiv'd, whereby he understood that he would arrive suddenly, and perhaps that very day. The Princess being unwilling to read it before her Woman, she did not continue to dress her head, but went into her Cabinet with Artemidorus. And there passing insensibly to speak of several things, the Princess forgot she was not attir'd, and stay'd discoursing a long time with the Prince her brother. During which, that Waiting-woman who had intelligence with Meleontus, left her companions to wait till the Princess came out of her Cabinet, and went to walk beyond the first Court of the Castle, where there is one of the fairest Walks, that ever was seen. As for me, I was then in my Chamber leaning upon a window that lookt towards one of the handsomest Courts in the World; for 'tis large, square, all pav'd with white Marble, environ'd with stately structures, and has a Pedestal in the middle, upon which are represented the three Graces, holding one another by the hand like Shepherdesses dancing; but made with such exquisite art, that these three Statues are an admirable spectacle in the midst of that fair Court. Having mus'd a while at my Chamber window, as I told you, I retir'd from it, and betook my self to read. In the mean time the Waiting-woman, whom (as I mention'd to you) went to walk beyond this stately Court, was no sooner there but she saw the Prince and Meleontus arrive, the latter of which came directly to her to enquire what the Princess was doing, and to hinder her from going to advertise her of the Prince's coming. The Woman telling him the truth, inform'd him that the Princess of Leontium was gone abroad in the morning, and that the Princess Lysimena, who would not accompany her, as soon as she was out of bed, went with her head half dress'd into her Cabinet with Artemidorus, where she believ'd they were still in great familiarity and conference. Meleontus no sooner heard this, but returning to the Prince and telling him what he had learnt, and animating him against his Sister, without considering what hurley-burly he was going to cause, or what the consequences of the course he took would be, he commanded his Guards to secure all the Gates of the first Court. After which the Prince of Leontium enter'd into that stately Court, and went directly to the stone stairs leading into the Castle. But for that this could not be done without some noise, the Princess being advertis'd of his arrival, spoke to Artemidorus to go forth of her Chamber and meet the Prince, to whom Meleontus (who had seen him before) might present him. For since Cleantibus is to arrive suddenly (said she) it is not yet fitting to think of making your self known, especially too, the Princess my Mother being absent. Accordingly Artemidorus passing through an Antichamber went into the Court; but the Prince conjecturing by the place he came out at that the Princess's Waiting-woman had not ly'd, and himself having seen at the windows of her Cabinet (for Lysimena's apartment was next the gound) with what haste she caus'd this man of good personage to come forth, he did not doubt but she was very culpable, and that the affection she had for him was criminal. Upon which, without considering any thing but his desire to punish the Princess and satisfy Meleontus; as soon as Artemidorus was in the Court, he look'd upon the violent Meleontus, who transported with choler, jealousy and fury, My Lord (said he to the Prince) permit me to punish the boldness of this Stranger who comes insolently to affront you. If you knew me well (answer'd Artemidorus without being mov'd) you would find it rather belong'd to me to desire justice of the Prince for your insolence. Whereupon the Prince of Leontium becoming suddenly enrag'd, and believing the Stranger intended to counterfeit himself a man of quality, that he might save his life, roughly commanded his Guards to seize upon him. After which he went towards the entrance, follow'd by Meleontus, Zenocrates and many others. Artemidorus desir'd to speak to him, but he was not heard: so that seeing several of the Prince's Guards with their swords drawn about him, he was no longer master of his indignation, and could not contain from drawing his sword, and dispersing them so dextrously, that one of the Guards running himself upon Artemidorus's sword, fell down dead immediately. The rest thereupon making a great cry, and all pressing hard upon him, he recover'd the Pedestal upon which the three Graces stood, to the end he might not be surrounded or assaulted on any side but before. The Guards made a great cry again, which causing me to give over my reading, I lookt out at the window and beheld the most sad spectacle in the world; for the pavement of white Marble was sprink'd with blood in many places, Artemidorus had slain two more of the Guards, whose bodies lay at the feet of this valiant Prince, who defended himself like a Lion. Presently after, all the Guards that were left at the Gates, quitted their stations to come and revenge the death of their companions. Meleontus, Zenocrates and all the rest, and the Prince himself return'd back to the stairs of the entrance, astonish'd at the valour of this man who defended himself so courageously, and immediately slew a Brother of Meleontus that advanc'd against him. Yet it must be mention'd to the commendation of Zenocrates, that tho' jealousy was deeply implicit in his mind, yet he extremely disapprov'd this violence, and told his sentiments to the Prince: but he would not hearken to them. All this while whatever Artemidorus, said to make himself known, was not regarded; he had no other recourse but to his own valor: which indeed was such, that none durst approach him; wherefore some of the Guards without the Prince's order shot arrows against him, and others cast javelins, tho' the Prince and Zenocrates endeavour'd to restrain them. As for Meleontus, his fury was so impetuous, that he wish'd nothing but the death of Artemidorus, believing he was his Rival, and a greater Favourite. For my part, I confess to my shame, I was in so great amazement, and seiz'd with such excessive fright, that I was unable either to speak or stir from the place. The Princess was more valiant than I; for when she saw so many swords turn'd against Artemidorus (who was slightly wounded in the left hand) so many arrows shot at him, and none heard what he said: seeing, I say that tho' by his dexterity, courage and agility, he repell'd all that set upon him (who durst not approach nearer to him than as far as the bodies of those he had slain) yet it would be impossible for him to avoid being overcome at length; she went forth with extreme diligence as soon as she was return'd from her first astonishment, and without considering that she had nothing upon her but a plain flying robe of white stuffe, that her neck was half naked, her hair loose, and her arms bare, she pass'd through the porch into the midst of all the armed people, endangering her self to be wounded with the arrows and javelins, and by her rare beauty shaming the Graces, at the feet of whom Artemidorus defended his life so valiantly, she plac'd her self between this valiant Prince and those that assaulted him, desiring by this generous action to cause the fight to cease, and to make Artemidorus known to the Prince his Brother. And indeed all the fierce assailants suspended their fury at her appearance: but for that this action was interpreted by the Prince, Meleontus and Zenocrates for a great testimony of love towards Artemidorus, it produc'd in them very different effects. The Prince redoubling his fury, Infamous Sister (cry'd he) do you come to defend your unworthy Lover in my sight? I shall punish you for your wickedness. At which he advanc'd towards her with his sword drawn, and had infallibly kill'd her, if the amorous Zenocrates (as jealous as he was) had not out of an excess of love cast himself between the Prince and Lysimena. Artemidorus also offer'd to doe the same; but at the very moment, Meleontus (whose jealousy and fury was redoubled by the generous action of the Princess) took a bow from the hands of an Archer, and shot with precipitation: but instead of killing Artemidorus as he design'd, he wounded Lysimena dangerously in the neck, and the same arrow glancing from her unhappily, enter'd into the body of Zenocrates (for Meleontus shot from the right side to the left) upon which both of them falling down, Lysimena resented the most violent grief that ever was, for she saw her self no longer able to hinder Artemidorus from perishing by the hands of her Brother: she saw her dear Zenocrates wounded for her sake, and understood by some words which he spoke as he fell, that he suspected her of being unfaithful. On the other side, Artemidorus being transported with grief to see Lysimena wounded, without caring to defend himself, offer'd to lift up the Princess: but the jealous Meleontus enrag'd for having wounded his Mistress and Zenocrates (whom (whom he now consider'd not as his Rival) instead of Artemidorus, did his endeavour to kill this valiant and generous Prince. But at the same instant the Princess of Leontium coming back from the Temple of Diana on the one side with all her train, and the wife Cleanthus arriving on the other, suppress'd the fury of the tumult. You may judge how astonish'd the Princess of Leontium was to find the Prince and Meleontus with their swords drawn, so many people slain, Artemidorus wounded, and Zenocrates and Lyfimena at the point of death, for the loss of blood depriv'd them both of speech. As for Cleanthus, as soon as he appear'd and beheld this strange spectacle, he went directly to the Prince, and speaking to him with the authority of one that had instructed him in his youth. How comes it, my Lord (said he to him) that I find you with your arms in your hand against the Prince Artemidorus your Brother? These words caus'd the Prince to blush, and Meleontus to wax pale, who was approacht whilst Artemidorus having broken through the throng went to give the Princess his Mother an account of what had hapned. The speech of Cleanthus, whom the Prince knew very well, strangely astonish'd him; for he was conscious there was no ground to suspect his probity. Nevertheless not being able to resolve suddenly to believe him, How? (said he) is he that I behold my Brother? and is that Brother my Sister's Lover? No, my Lord (answer'd Artemidorus, who led the Princess his Mother) and if you would have heard me, you had not done as you have, nor enforc'd me to kill those unhappy persons whom I knew not. Ah! my Son (cry'd the Princess of Leontium, speaking to the Prince) I cannot but accuse you of a great crime, and regret my own unhappiness. However (added she) leave me in peace in this desert, endeavour to save my Daughter's life, and be assuredly perswaded Artemidorus is your Brother. He made himself known to me first of all; your Sister understood his quality from my mouth; and had it not been that I waited for the arrival of Cleanthus you had been informed of the truth before. Then Cleanthus adding many circumstances for the confirmation of his being Son to the Princess of Leontium, the Prince better consider'd him, & acknowledg'd him to be his brother, and thereupon being much ashamed of his action, he desir'd pardon of him for it. My Lord (answer'd Artemidorus) I am ready to forget the injury you have done me; but I beseech you that he who wounded the Princess my Sister, may appear no longer in my sight; otherwise, all the respect I bear you cannot hinder me from punishing him for so detestable an action. In the mean time, I being descended, approacht to the Princess, and fell upon my knees by her, endeavouring to bring her to her self again. Meleontus was at his wits end for what he had done, and came to help me to hold her up; but as I was going to thrust him away, he heard what Artemidorus spoke: upon which his rage being redoubled, You have reason, my Lord (said he to him) you have reason; and to testify to you that I judge my self as culpable as unhappy, behold what a generous repentance shall lead me to. In speaking which, he offer'd to strike a Ponyard into his own heart; but the Prince (who lov'd him much) abating part of his impetuosity by seising upon his arm, the Ponyard did not pierce so deep as he design'd it; but yet it did enough, to cause some compassion even in him whom he had desir'd to kill.

The Princess having caus'd Lyfimena to be carried to a bed, and given order for care to be taken of Zenocrates, and the dead to be remov'd out of the Court, the Prince committed Meleontus to the custody of three or four of his followers, and caus'd him to be conducted into a back Garden-house, notwithstanding all his own resistance; for he was resolv'd to dy, and would by no means admit of any course to preserve his life. In the mean time, Cleanthus discoursing with the Prince, and employing all his prudence to perswade him that Artemidorus would remember nothing that had pass'd, reduc'd his mind to a good temper, and counsel'd him to return that evening to Leontium, and to carry thither him that designing to kill Artemidorus wounded Lyfimena, till this first disorder were compos'd, and it were seen what would become of Lyfimena's and Zenocrates's wounds; for, as for the Prince Artemidorus, that which he had received in his left hand, was very slight. So the Prince following the counsels of the wife Cleanthus (for whom he still retain'd much respect) departed as soon as he understood Lyfimena was come again from her swoon, and caus'd Meleontus to be put into a Chariot, having first caus'd his wound to be dress'd by force, leaving Cleanthus order to tell the Princess his Mother, the Prince Artemidorus and Lyfimena, all that he judg'd conducive to appease their minds; tho' to speak truth, this Prince thought himself guilty of nothing but precipitancy. And as for the action of Meleontus, he consider'd it as a violence which love and jealousy might excuse. But Meleontus himself was more equitable, for he accus'd himself in good earnest. How unhappy am I (said he upon the waies he return'd, to one of his own and my friends, who told me this) and how great a Criminal! I have committed all crimes imaginable, I have rashly suspected the most virtuous Princess in the World, I have accus'd her, I have incens'd the Prince's mind against her, I have put fury into his heart, and weapons in his hand against the Prince his Brother, & the Princess his sister, and wretch that I am, after that I had seen Artemidorus perform the greatest actions in the world, I went about to kill him with the shot of an Arrow. But moreover, the Gods to punish me for it, have permitted that unfortunate Arrow to wound mortally both an innocent friend, and the only person for whose sake life could be acceptable to me. And nevertheless, they will not let me dye, they force me to live, they keep me too, as if I still deserv'd, that any care should be taken of my life. But 'tis in vain (added he) that I am watcht, and that every thing which might procure my death is remov'd from me; I need neither steel nor poyson; my grief alone will be sufficient to dispatch me. For when I reflect, that I am he who have brought my Princess into danger, and that in attempting to kill a man whom I believ'd my Rival, perhaps I have slain my Mistress; I resent a torment a thousand times more cruel than death, a torment greater than can be apprehended, and which I cannot wholly conceive my self; since at the same time I am overwhelmed with shame, repentance, grief, and abhorrence of my self, as much love as is needful to render my fault for ever unpardonable, and as much rage as is necessary to make life odious, and death desirable every moment. Besides, what have I to do longer in the World? the Princess did not love me, whilst I did nothing but studied to serve her; judge therefore, what sentiments she will have, if she escapes, for a man that would have blemish'd her honour, taken the Prince Artemidorus's life away after an unworthy manner, and

and who has endanger'd her own? Had I gone about to kill this Prince, as a man of courage may kill an Enemy, it would be more pardonable, but jealousie so transported me, when I beheld Lyfimena hazard her life to save that of a man whom I believ'd my Rival, that in that accursed moment I abandon'd my reason, and cast off all sense of virtue and honour, to mind only a speedy revenge. But alas! the Gods have already reveng'd the cause of Lyfimena; for I hate my self so horribly, that I never had a more ardent affection for her than I have now detestation for my self. In this manner reasoned the unfortunate Meleontus, whilst the wife Cleanthus endeavour'd to pacifie matters at the Castle, where he stay'd.

Cleanthus (said Plotina interrupting Amiclea) has done me a pleasure in arriving, and I should be glad to know a person who has so excellently educated the Prince Artemidorus. For my part (said Clelia) I fancy him to be like one of the Sages that are so much spoken of. For I have heard him so extoll'd by Merigenes, the young King of Phenicia, and the Prince his brother, whom he instructed, that I imagine him to be a very excellent person.

To testify the submission of my will to yours (answer'd Amiclea) I shall describe him to you, and indeed I am something of such an humour, that I am loath to pass over my Friends without commending them a little, when I speak to persons that do not know them; and I conceive generosity requires as much from all people, and that there is some pleasure, when we are alone to remember we have done justice to our friends when they were mention'd.

I beseech you (said Plotina) let us speak of Cleanthus, and leave the pleasures that we find in our selves; for, as for my part, I am perswaded they are the saddest pleasures in the world. Yet they are the most solid (answer'd Clelia). Believe me (added Plotina agreeably) solidity is not to be requir'd in pleasures; 'tis sufficient if they be sprightly and jovial, if they dazzle reason, and follow one after another, if they be various and deceive us, and amuse us agreeably; and to put the thing in practise, after having had the pleasure to relieve my self from a long silence by what I have said, tell us, amiable Amiclea, what a person the wife Cleanthus is.

Know than (reply'd Amiclea) he whose description you desire, is a man of transcendent merit, and his eminent virtue has plac'd him above envy and the envious. His lineage is very good, and it would be easie to find wherewith to commend him in many things which are extrinsecal to him: but not to speak of ought but himself, I shall content my self with telling you, that tho Cleanthus be arriv'd to that age, wherein time is wont to efface part of the lineaments that compose handsomeness in a face, yet he has still a serene aspect full of spirit and sweetness, which pleases infinitely. His eyes partly discover his wisdom and goodness; and tho he is not tall, yet he has a good personage, and the absolute air of a Philosopher that practices more virtue than he teaches. There appears so modest a joy in his converse, so prudent a complacency in all his discourse, and a goodness so real in all his actions, that his conversation begets a love of virtue in all that are capable of it. Moreover, he has been chosen (as I told you before) to instruct two of the greatest Princes in the World in several considerable kinds of knowledge, besides the Prince of Leontium and Artemidorus. He has all his life so passionately lov'd study, that it may be said, he never spent day without learning something: so that he has compos'd an infinite number of excellent works, which are indubitable testimonies of his knowledge and virtue. For there is scarce any thing of which he has not written plausibly, with intention to profit the publick, and render the Readers of his works, either better or more knowing; which in my judgement is a very great commendation. But tho Cleanthus be very learned, and his works, deserve to live immortally, yet I admire his virtue more than his knowledge, especially having preserv'd it immaculate in the midst of a great Court, where for the most part, such as are most virtuous find it something difficult to persist exactly in the purity of their own sentiments. But, as for Cleanthus, nothing changes him, he is so solidly virtuous: but his virtue is sociable, far from asperity or savageness, which perswades rather by sweetness than impetuosity, and which by the calmness of his mind renders it sufficiently manifest apparent, that he has been a long and happier Studier of Wisdom; for he is none of those who know virtue without following it, and teach the virtues which they never practice. On the contrary, Cleanthus speaks more morality by his actions than his discourses, and instructs no less by his manners than by works. Thus you see what a person the wife Cleanthus is, whose presence calm'd so great a tempest.

But to proceed, as soon as the Princess came out of her swoon, she thought upon Artemidorus & Zenocrates, and seeing me in her chamber with tears in my eyes, she call'd me as weak as she was, and (tho her wound sufficiently pain'd her) stretcht forth her hand to me, and grasping mine gently, I beseech you, my dear Amiclea (said she to me, beholding me wishly) tell me whether the tears you shed be for Artemidorus, or for the unfortunate Zenocrates. The Prince Artemidorus (answer'd I) is so little hurt, that he feels no wound but yours! and as for Zenocrates, I know not yet what the Chirurgions say of him: so that, Madam, my tears are only for your self. Since my life is so dear to you (reply'd she with a lower voice) take some care of that of Zenocrates, and let me know what condition he is in. Whereupon soon after I understood that his wound was dangerous indeed, but yet not desperate. As for the Princess, she was in very great danger, because she was taken with a Fever. Zenocrates greatest affliction was occasion'd, for that no person, except myself, knowing the love he had for Lyfimena, he was told of the danger in which she was. By which means his weakness became greater than it would if he had been ignorant of that of Lyfimena. As for Artemidorus, he had so tender a friendship for her, that he could not have been much more afflicted if he had been her Lover; and as we are easily led to love such as have been willing to serve those whom we love, this Prince had likewise in a little time a very great friendship for Zenocrates, who so generously oppos'd the violence of the Prince of Leontium, and was wounded with the same stroke that hurt the Princess. Zenocrates knowing I was not ignorant of his love, us'd to me the most moving and passionate expressions in the world as often as I went to visit him from the Princess. Whose virtue (on the other side) I assure you I could not but admire in this occasion, for tho she believ'd she should dy, yet she always preserv'd the same prudence, and did not speak one word which she ought to repent of: she talk'd with me concerning Zenocrates always with expressions of great dearness, but yet it was with such caution too, that what she said might as well agree to an amiable amiable Friend as a faithful Lover. But at length Lysimena's youth overcoming the greatness of her distemper, her Physicians one day assur'd she was past all danger of death! of which Artemidorus transported with joy went to inform Zenocrates, who receiv'd this good news with so much delight, that the Prince perceiv'd he was amorous of Lysimena. But he was rather glad than displeased at it; for he hated Meleontus, and knowing Zenocrates was descended from the ancient Princes of Herbesa (altho his rank was now inferiour to that of his Ancestors) he was not sorry that so worthy a man lov'd the Princess his Sister, judging too, that this might rather hinder him from pardoning Meleontus. This discovery exciting the Prince to a curiosity of knowing Lysimena's sentiments as well, one day when she was able to suffer his conversation, he began to glibe at her a little about Zenocrates, whose life, he said, she had almost endanger'd. The Princess blusht when Artemidorus spoke thus to her; wherefore fearing he had displeas'd her, I beseech you (said he to her) do not think I speak to you as the Prince my brother would do, namely, with a design to persecute you; No, my dear sister (added he) I have more equitable sentiments, I speak to you as a faithful Friend, and desire not to know your thoughts, for any other end, but to conform my self to them; for I know you love glory, and are incapable of loving any thing without it. My Lord (said the Princess than to him, recollecting her self) to testify to you that I consider you more as a faithful friend than a generous brother, I will make you privy to the only secret of my life, and confess to you, that if I did not take care to rule the sentiments of my heart, I should have as great inclination for Zenocrates as I have aversion for Meleontus. But for as much as I foresee fortune cannot permit us to live together, I speak to him always as an agreeable Friend, and I forbid him to hope any such thing as a Lover might pretend to, beyond a certain free and uninterested kindness, which I cannot refuse him. This, my Lord, is the only secret of my life, use it as you please; and if you find me Criminal, you will do me a pleasure in telling me so, to the end I may endeavour to correct my fault. This freedom so extremely pleas'd Artemidorus, that he gave her a thousand thanks; he approv'd all her sentiments, and there became such an intimate and confiding a friendship between them, as will last all their lives. Afterwards Artemidorus with the Princess's consent intimated to Zenocrates that he understood his affection; which produc'd in a few days a very strait amity between these three persons, who moreover had such an esteem of me as to communicate to me all their sentiments. In the mean time Cleantbus found it a matter of difficulty to compose matters; for the Prince loving Meleontus dearly, urg'd that Lysimena and Artemidorus would pardon him: these two persons on the contrary could not yield to see a man who had committed an action likely to prove so fatal to them. Nor could the Princess their Mother be brought to consent to return to Leontium as long as he was there, and desir'd that the Prince would banish him for ever. But Amerintha, whom the Prince was amorous of, protecting Meleontus, there was no obtaining of what she requir'd. So Cleantbus made frequent journies from the Castle where we were to Leontium, and from Leontium to the Castle to no purpose. All this while Meleontus was under a guard, tho it was more to hinder attempts upon his life then to satistie Lysimena and Artemidorus. At length the Princess being recover'd from her sickness, became able to walk in the Gardens of the Castle, which are indeed admirably handsome. As soon as she was in a condition to see the world, all the chief Ladies of Leontium came to visit her, and Clidamira (whom you know) amongst others came thither with one of her Kinswomen. It hapned that Artemidorus accounted her so amiable that day, that he began to be possess'd with the passion which occasion'd all the adventures I know you have heard of. And therefore I shall tell you scarce any thing of it, but only that one day she came with Andromira and several other Ladies who stay'd to pass that night with us. Towards the evening the Princess and the Ladies went to walk in the Gardens, and Amerintha so brought it about that her self discours'd with Artemidorus, Andromira entertain'd Zenocrates (tho he did not much desire it) another Lady employ'd her self in recounting to me a hundred things which did not concern me; and in the mean time one of her friends, who is as crafty a person as any in the world, led the Princess insensibly into a walk, at the end of which was a Pavilion that had a door opening into the fields. The further end of the place was set about with seats, in which to repose without the inconvenience of the Sun, or being seen of any that walk in the Garden, (tho it be wholly open on the side towards the end of the Walk), because there are great curtains before it which may be drawn at pleasure. The Princess having unwillingly suffered her self to be conducted into this Cabinet, beheld the Curtains half drawn, and observ'd that the gate looking into the fields half shut: but making no reflections upon these two circumstances, which might proceed from several causes she enter'd into the Cabinet without minding that the Lady did not follow her into it, but was gone back into the Walk. She had scarce made three steps in it, but she beheld Meleontus at her feet, who holding her by the Robe; notwithstanding her reluctancy forc'd her to hearken to him; for she being still weak by her late sickness, and astonishment redoubling her weakness, she was constrain'd to sit down for fear of falling. At which instant she was in a fear lest Meleontus intended to carry her away, and therefore made a great shriek: which nevertheless was not heard by any person, because the company was all in another Walk, where she that was Meleontus's Agent knew well her Friends would upon handsome pretences retain them. Wherefore Meleontus not to lose an opportunity he could not easily recover, being upon his knees before the Princess who was sat down, began to speak to her with a strange commotion of heart: I beseech you, Madam, (said he to her extream submissively) hear the unfortunate Meleontus this last time; which certainly you ought to do, Madam, since he does not pretend to obtain the pardon which he desires of you with tears in his eyes. The unfortunate Meleontus (answer'd the Princess) is so criminal, that there are no misfortunes of which he is not worthy. I acknowledge it, Madam (reply'd he hastily). and I took the liberty of coming hither for no other end but to confess it. How dare you, Meleontus (said the Princess) come to present your self before me, after you have believ'd me capable of a crime? for in comparison of this, I count it almost nothing that you wounded me neer to death. But to speak truth, I resent most of all, that you went about to kill the Prince my Brother after the most unworthy manner in the World.

Ah!

Ah! Madam (answer'd Meleontus) when I saw you so fair, and so charming pass amongst the swords and the arrows with contempt of the danger to save the life of a man whom I believ'd my Rival, and thought was lov'd by you, I resented that which I am unable to express; and in this case I must have been void of love, if I could have preserv'd respect and generosity. I confess therefore, that I minded only to kill him whom I believ'd your Lover; and if Zenocrates had been still amorous of you, he would questionless have done the same that I did. Be it how it will (said she) I am well enough pleas'd with Zenocrates, but I am not so with you. Alas! Madam (answered Meleontus) How can you, since I am not so my self, but on the contrary am my own most mortal Enemy? Yes, Madam, I hate my self more than you hate me, and I have at this present such remorse for my violence, and such respect for you, that I dare not dye here before your eyes, for fear the Prince who loves me should reproach you with my death. Know therefore, Madam, that perceiving the division which I cause between the Prince of Leontium, the Prince Artemidorus, and your self, I am resolv'd to put an end to that contest by my flight. To which purpose, I have suborn'd my Guards, whilst the Prince is at hunting, and by ways which I need not tell you, am come into this Garden, to assure you here, that I will go seek death in some place so remote from Leontium, that no tidings shall ever be heard of me. I will also leave the name which I bear, to the end it may be no more distasteful to you, and retaining all the love I have for you, I will live the most miserable of men, whithersoever I go, if at least I have strength enough to live any time longer, only to adore you. Meleontus spoke this so passionately, that the Princess told me all her hatred and indignation could not hinder her from having a little commiseration of him. Nevertheless, she conceal'd it, for fear he should alter his purpose; and therefore speaking to him with a severe air, After bad actions are committed (said she to him) 'tis not enough to speak fine words; a long repentance, a long absence, and a thousand services are requisite to the producing of a reasonable hope of being indur'd amongst persons of honour. Howsoever, since I am equitable, I commend the design you take, as that alone which is fitting for you. Go therefore, Meleontus; go (continu'd she, rising up) go ask pardon of the Gods; for, as for me, I should delude you if I should tell you that I pardon you. I have already told you (answer'd the afflicted Meleontus) that I did not hope to obtain the pardon which I desir'd; but at least grant me the favour to believe that the excess of my love is the cause of all my Crimes, and that if I had lov'd you less, I had been always innocent. 'Tis the only and last favour I shall ever request of you, not daring to desire so much as a little compassion when you shall imagine that I am dead in exile only for love of you. As the Princess was going to speak something to him, Meleontus saw all the Company appear afar off, who (notwithstanding all the contrivance of the Lady that return'd back to amuse them handsomely in the mean time) were seeking for the Princess, and could not longer want her presence. So that Meleontus being constrain'd to go away, rose up, and the Princess suddenly leaving him without speaking, he went forth at the door of the Pavilion which opened into the fields, mounted upon a Horse held ready for him by a slave, and lost himself in a wood not far distant. Yet this could not be done but that Zenocrates knew Meleontus. As for Artemidorus, he observ'd nothing, because he was speaking earnestly to Clidamira; and there was none but Zenocrates and my self who saw Meleontus. He no sooner perceiv'd him, but he chang'd colour, came to me, and looking upon me with somewhat a disturb'd countenance, What did I see? Amiclea, (said he) Did my eyes deceive me? Is it possible Meleontus could be where I believ'd I saw him? Has the Princess pardoned him? What think you of that which I know you perceiv'd as well as my self? In truth (said I to him) I know not what I ought to think of it, but I know well the Princess can never be unjust, and that her aspect tells me she is as much surpris'd as we. I beseech you, generous Amiclea (reply'd Zenocrates) know the truth of this Adventure, for the respect I bear the Princess withholds me from asking it of her. And accordingly approaching towards Lyssimena, she drew me aside, and did me the honour to tell me what had hapned. After which having called Artemidorus and Zenocrates, she related to them the same she had told me before. At first the departure of Meleontus seem'd very advantageous; but afterwards considering the Prince would be afflicted at it, it was fear'd his displeasure would fall upon Lyssimena, Artemidorus, or Zenocrates. However it was judg'd convenient to advertise the Princess of Leontium and Cleanthus of what had pass'd; and accordingly Lyssimena ending her walk sooner than otherwise she would have done, return'd into the Castle. She was not long there, before there arriv'd a friend of Zenocrates, who came to advertise the Princess that Meleontus was gone away from the place where he was guarded without being known whither, that the Prince was extremely troubled at it, that this Favorite had left the most passionate Letter in the world for him, and that Amerintha was much employ'd in comforting him. It was requisite therefore to have recourse to the prudence of Cleanthus who was at Leontium, to the end to appease the Prince's mind whom he found very sad for the departure of Meleontus. He found him also much incens'd against Lyssimena, whose rigour was the innocent cause of all these disorders: but at length Cleanthus telling him that the way to cause Meleontus to return, was to treat Lyssimena well, and to endeavour thereby to win her, things were pacified in the end, in spite of the artifices of Amerintha. Yet this division extremely afflicted the Princess of Leontium, so that she fell sick and dyed within a few days after. Lyssimena and Artemidorus were sensibly touch'd with this loss: but for the Prince of Leontium, he was not much afflicted at it, because he believ'd Lyssimena would thereby be more absolutely in his power. Shortly after, Lyssimena returned to lodge in the Prince's Palace, and during some days led a life pleasant enough. Artemidorus at that time became perfectly amorous of Clidamira, which strangely incens'd Amerintha who could not touch his heart. Wherefore she obliged the Prince highly to disapprove the affection he had for that Lady; and it was she that prevail'd with him to cause her to be put amongst the veiled Virgins, as no doubt you have heard in the relation of the History of Artemidorus. For she designed thereby to cross a Prince whom she did not love, and to serve Meleontus, with whom 'tis believ'd she has always had some secret correspondence. For it was easie to judge that Artemidorus would not fail to fall out totally with the Prince after this violence; and so Lyssimena would lose a powerful protector. The event manifested that she was not deceiv'd; for you know Artemidorus voluntarily exil'd himself, to deliver Clidamira. But whereas it is not his History that I am relating, and you are ignorant of nothing that befel him, I will not tell you of his departure, his shipwreck, the resolution he took to go to the War, and in what manner he became prisoner to the Prince of Agrigentum, nor how he fell in love with Berelisa; but only what concerns Lysimena and Zenocrates. You shall know then, that after the departure of Artemidorus, Zenocrates (to continue to act according to his custom) made semblance of being in love with Clidamira, as soon as she came out from amongst the veiled Virgins, that afterwards he made Courtship for some days to another, but at length conceiving that since Meleontus was absent he might dispense with this dissimulation, he continued for some time without a Mistress. Whereupon it was said of him in railery, that of an inconstant person he was become indifferent; and I remember, Clidamira, being one day with Lysimena, undertook to maintain that it was much more honest to be inconstant than to be indifferent. For, I know nothing more hateful (said she in defence of her opinion) than such people as neither love nor hate, who determine themselves to nothing, and have so lukewarm a soul, that they are not very strongly on their own side. Ask them if they will walk; they know not: inquire of them, whether they would have people love them; they are dubious of it: do them any service; they take no notice of it: offer to displease them; they scarce perceive it: so much are they afraid to disquiet their happy indifference. But as for inconstant persons (added she) they have always something to do; they go, they come, they are employed; and though they desire nothing vehemently, and disclaim obstinacy, yet they are always determin'd to something. They fill some place, and signify something in the World, and at least make themselves to be spoken of, be it well or ill. 'Tis true (answer'd Lysimena) but if you observe, the indifferent and the inconstant are not too opposite. For an inconstant person loves indifferently all the Beauties of a City; 'tis only because he has some kind of indifference in his heart, that he loves several persons. And, for my part, methinks, I should love an indifferent person who is determin'd to nothing, better than an inconstant who determines himself to inconstancy, who makes a glory of his weakness, who believes he cannot be a gallant without being a profess'd shittle-brain, and who loving nothing ardently, yet passes all his life as if he lov'd. For the name of Love is not to be given to those transient affections which succeed one after another, which perplex hearts without possessing them, and which almost produce nothing but Sonnets. The Princess spoke this with a certain air, which made Amerintha (who was present) suspect something; for she judg'd that Zenocrates appearing to be so much in her favour ought to take ill her arguing so strongly against inconstancy, if she believ'd him inconstant. So that observing these things, and inquiring diligently of that waiting woman who formerly gave Meleontus intelligence of all Lysimena's actions, and whom the Princess had discarded; she came at length to discover that Zenocrates was always ardently amorous of her, and that his inconstancy was but dissembled. And forasmuch as she could turn the Prince's mind after what manner she pleas'd, Lysimena was one morning extremely amazed to understand that the Prince had commanded Zenocrates to depart his Court at an hours warning, with prohibition to see her before he went away. You may judge how displeasing this news was to her, especially too being advertis'd that Meleontus had writ to the Prince two days before. So it behov'd Zenocrates to go from Leontium without seeing the Princess; nevertheless, he came back thither the same night, conceal'd himself at the house of one of his Friends, and three days after contriv'd a way to speak with Lysimena by night in a Garden. Their conversation was the most pathetic in the World; for they saw no ground of hope ever to live happy. I know well (said Lysimena to him) That your descent is more illustrious than Rank you hold at present is eminent. I know likewise that your merit sees nothing above it, and I will believe that your affection cannot be surpass'd by any other; but, when all is done, the Prince my Brother is extreme unjust and violent. He loves Meleontus whom I hate, and Artemidorus is not here; add hereunto that his Mistress hates us, and does us no less mischief than his favourite. We have no Sanctuary in any place; and though we had, a sentiment of honour would not suffer me to wish we were there together. But, Madam (said Zenocrates) what then will you shall become of me? I would have you (answer'd she) endeavour to find Artemidorus, adhere to his fortune, and trust to my constancy. Alas! Madam (reply'd he) may an unfortunate absent person be assured of a thing which he ardently desires? Yes, Zenocrates (answer'd Lysimena) when she that promises him is indu'd with generosity. But your self (added the Princess) take heed absence do not change you, and that I have not cause one day to make you a thousand reproaches. Time shall justify me, Madam (said he to her) and you shall see me during all my life the same I am this day, that is, the most faithful Lover that ever was. Alas! Zenocrates (answer'd she) there was never an unfaithful Lover in the World, but a moment before his infidelity swore he would be eternally faithful; therefore answer nothing, and leave me to fear that which I cannot but be apprehensive of. Zenocrates then made a thousand the most earnest protestations of fidelity that can be imagined; after which he departed, and went first to Syracusa, and from thence to Agrigentum, where you know he found Artemidorus, from whom he has ever since been inseparable. During his stay there, he writ very diligently to Lysimena; but having made a long practise of appearing inconstant, he was so accustomed when he was with a fair person, to use Courtship to her, that he did not change his manner. For when Clidamira was at Agrigentum, there were some days in which she was not displeasing to him. And indeed Zenocrates is a little of the humor of those people who think an honest man cannot be call'd unfaithful, though he make some transitory Gallantries, and that the true Mistress ought to be contented, provided she be the chief Lady (to speak in their own terms) and that the Lover be always ready to Sacrifice the rest to her, when she knows it and requires it. So then without being scrupulous in his passion, he came to have something that seem'd like love for Clidamira. And this person who has always lov'd to trouble the contentment of others (though she then lov'd Artemidorus who did not love her any longer) writ maliciously to Leontium to a Friend of hers, that Zenocrates had been very amorous of her, and would have been so still, if she had hearkned to him. Forasmuch

as she knew that she to whom she writ was no keeper of a secret, her design succeeded; the Princess soon heard of this news, which she the more deeply resented, for that after the departure of Artemidorus, she had suffered a hundred persecutions from the Prince, who continually regretted the case of Meleontus. Whereupon she complain'd to me with much tenderness, nor that she did not believe Zenocrates always lov'd her, but she could not endure he should have any kindness or complacency for another. How unjust men are? (said she to me) They will have an intire heart, they are jealous of a shar'd glance, and nevertheless they take a liberty to divide themselves upon the least occasion that is presented; and I am perswaded they are ordinarily much more inconstant when they are lov'd, than whilst they only seek to have themselves lov'd: though nothing is more unreasonable than to be less faithful to a person that loves you, than to one by whom you are not lov'd. Such were the sentiments of Lysimena; who being advertis'd that Meleontus was shortly to return, professed her self discontented with the World, and retired amongst the Veiled Virgins which are near Leontium, and I accompany'd her. The Prince was highly offended herewith, though he conceal'd his resentment; and causing Meleontus to hasten his return, this Favorite soon after came again to Court, hoping that during the absence of Artemidorus he might obtain his pardon of Lysimena. But whereas at his taking leave of this Princess, he had spoken to her like a man that went to seek death, and was never to come again, he therefore writ to her at his return almost in these terms.

The unfortunate Meleontus to Lysimena.

IF you knew, Madam, all that I have done to dye of grief, you could not accuse me of living contrary to my word: for I have continually remembered your rigours, my Crimes and my infelicity. I have sigh'd, I have lamented, I have not had a moment of quiet, I have complain'd of you, and I have complain'd of myself; I have loved you, I have hated myself, and in brief, I have led the most miserable life in the World. But after all, Madam, I have not been able to dye absent from you; wherefore being perswaded Destiny would have me dye in the same place where I had the unhappiness to displease, and offend you, I am returned hither to satisfy you. These, Madam, are the sentiments of the unfortunate Meleontus, who loves you more than he ever lov'd you, although he knows you hate him.

This Letter being very patheticall, I confess to you, though I was Zenocrates's Friend, I told the Princess, that sometimes it was requisite not to be too obstinate against fortune, that there were unhappineses that could not be overcome otherwise than by yielding to them, and that perhaps she would not do very ill in pardoning Meleontus, yet without ingaging her self to any thing more. How? (answered Lysimena hastily) is it possible for me to lose the natural aversion I have always had for Meleontus? Can I forget that he has been guilty of the injustice to suspect me of a weakness I cannot think of without horror? That he has been so unworthy as to go about to kill a man that was assaulted by above thirty, and whom he could not wound without endangering to kill me, as indeed he wounded me in such a manner that I lookt for nothing but death? What know I but that that he design'd to kill me as well as Artemidorus? No, no, Amiclea (said she to me) Meleontus shall always be hated by Lysimena, though even Zenocrates should prove unfaithful. After this I durst urge the Princess no more. In the mean time the Prince of Leontium being urg'd by Amerintha, resolv'd to force Lysimena to marry Meleontus, and design'd to come and take her with Authority from amongst the Veiled Virgins, in whose number was a Kinswoman of the Prince of Perusia, who was shortly to be sent back into the Country of that Prince, there to establish a Temple and a Covent of Virgins like this. Wherefore the Princess (though her mind was exasperated against Zenocrates) seeing her self in danger to marry Meleontus or a perpetual prison (for she was advertis'd that this was the design of the Prince) took the opportunity which fortune presented her, and resolv'd to pass the Sea with these Virgins, to go to Perusia, leaving order with her that governed those that stay'd, not to discover whither she was gone. And accordingly the matter was effected, though her Waiting-women endeavour'd to avert her from it.

So Lysimena believing Zenocrates too little faithful, and fearing to be forced to marry Meleontus, went away (as I said before) to Perusia, with intent to resolve if possible to spend her life amongst the Veiled Virgins which were to be establish'd there. As for me, I loving her dearly, and having no Mother, scrupled not to follow her fortune, however resolv'd to hinder her from executing her purpose. But to speak truth, I believe the affection she has always had for Zenocrates hindered her from it rather than I. In the mean time the Prince still suffer'd it to be believ'd in Sicily that the Princess Lysimena was amongst the Veiled virgins with whom she had shut up her self, having been a long time without discovering where she was. As for Meleontus, he continued Favorite to the Prince, and very much afflicted for the absence of the Princess. But for that he has seen her flight was a pure effect of her hatred, I believe his love is much diminish'd, and that he studies only to hinder Artemidorus and Lysimena from returning to Leontium. As for the Princess, she found an inviolable sanctuary with Mezentius Prince of Perusia; and you are not ignorant that being there in a time of the great disorders that happened between Porfenna and him, she serv'd Aronces considerably when he came to deliver the Prince his Father; and having afterwards found better protection with Porfenna and Galerita than Mezentius, she has continued in their Court, where she has acquir'd a high reputation, and where Artemidorus and Zenocrates understanding of her residence, pass'd to Syracusa where Amilcar was, and came into Italy together, where they have seen Lysimena many times. Zenocrates has been able to justify himself, or at least to desire pardon for his customary inconstancies, in which nevertheless he swears his heart was never concern'd. But for his punishment, he is become jealous within a few days, and we cannot imagine who it should be that gives occasion to this jealousy.

However, we have understood a thing, which in my judgment will decide the interests of Berelisa and Clidamira in reference to Artemidorus; for you shall know we have discovered by an antient Lover of Lyfimena, who came from Leontium a while since, and has had news from thence within these two days, that Clidamira has great credit in that Court, and so great, that Artemidorus and Lyfimena cannot return thither but by her negotiation. That which gives her this authority, is, because there is a half engag'd love between her and Meleontus, who knows not that she still loves Artemidorus. The man whom I mention'd having brought a Letter of Clidamira's to Meleontus, which the Favorite lost and one of my Friends sends me, the Princess has purposed to give it to Artemidorus as soon as his health shall be better, to the end to let him fully know the levity of this unfaithful fair one, of whom nevertheless they have great need; for being the Prince of Leontium is weak and over-rul'd by Amerintha and his Favorite, reason can prevail nothing at all with him.

Thus, Madam (said Amiclea to Clelia) I have recounted to you what you and your amiable Friends desir'd to know; and I beg your pardon for the little art I have us'd in making this relation.

A Miclea holding her peace, all these fair Virgins thank'd her: but Clelia with a little more coldness than the rest, having her mind so taken up with Zenocrates's jealousy, whereof she thought she knew the cause, that she scarce took notice of what was spoken. But there was none besides Plotina that observ'd the alteration of her countenance; for Amilcar, Anacreon, and Merigenes being enter'd, the conversation was chang'd. The first discourse was of the War past, the Truce and the Peace; then, of Love; and afterwards concerning Themistus and Merigenes, who were shortly to depart. For my part (said Plotina) I envy those that go to Syracusa; for I confess to you I have heard speak of a Lady call'd Amalthea, whose merit charms me. Tell me then, I conjure you (said she to Merigenes) whether they that brought the intelligence from Lindamirato to Themistus, told you nothing concerning that admirable Woman. All that I can say (answer'd Merigenes) is, that Amalthea is continually more generous, that her virtue is never weary of obliging the unfortunate, and that after a noble manner, namely, without ostentation or interest; and the young and charming Clarissa her Niece is at this time one of the most amiable Virgins in the World. For advancing in age she is become more beautiful than she was, she has perform'd more than she promis'd, though there was great expectation of her; and her mind being imbellish'd as well as her visage, contributes to render her eyes more glittering, her physiognomy more agreeable, and her deportment more noble: in brief, she has so well improv'd the advantage of residing with one of the most excellent Women in the World, that in this amiable Virgin are found all the charms of youth without any of the defects that ordinarily accompany that age. She is discreet and judicious, debonaire and modest, exact both in friendship and constancy; and it may be said to her honour, that when she is known, it is easie to divine under whom she has been educated. I beseech you (said Plotina then) when you go to Syracusa, tell the generous Amalthea and the charming Clarissa, that they have a Friend at Rome, whose friendship will cost them as little to preserve as it has to acquire. I promise to tell them whatsoever you please (answer'd Merigenes) and to tell it them in one of the most delectable places in the World. For I am told that since my departure the generous Artaxander and the virtuous Amalthea have finish'd the building of a low apartment that lies along a fair Garden, and takes up the length of their stately Palace. You will do me a pleasure to speak of me in so excellent a place and in so good company (replied Plotina) but I should not be unwilling that you would at least carry my fanfie thither whither according to all appearances I am never likely to go in person. I shall obey you (said Merigenes) yet I will not undertake to make you an exact description of that magnificent Palace; for I fear I should a little pervert the order of Architecture. You are very prudent (said Amilcar) not to perplex your self willingly amongst Pilasters, Columns, Frieses, and Cornishes; for I remember I once knew a pretender to fine wit, who going about to describe a handsome house, put the Chapter in the place of the Base, the Pilaster upon the Column, and (if I am not mistaken) the Porch at the third story. But yet he had the faculty of employing all the terms of the most exquisite Architecture, from the Fuming Pots to the Altragals. 'Tis true he did not put them in their right place; but nevertheless believing he understood himself, he conceiv'd he was understood too by his hearers, and was very much satisfied with it. To avoid therefore the like inconveniences, (answer'd Merigenes, after he had laugh'd a little as well as the rest of the company at that which Amilcar spoke) I shall content my self to tell you in general that the Palace of Artaxander and Amalthea is large and magnificent, and were it finish'd, would be one of the goodliest in the world. That which renders it more agreeable, is, that it is built upon the Haven of Syracusa, that there is a spacious and fair Garden belonging to it, that the Court of it is handsome, that the Stair-case is very excellent, that there are great and goodly apartments in it, that there are little ones too, agreeable and convenient; and that all the places and parts of this Palace are uniform, magnificent and well contriv'd. But to describe only the low apartment (in which I purpose to speak of you) I must tell you it is contriv'd in such a manner, that all that can be wish'd is to be found in it; for there are so many rooms upon the same plain, that my memory is puzzled to retain them. There are anti-chambers, Chambers, a Gallery, Cabinets at both ends; and all these so well contriv'd that all the doors of those several places which are upon the same rowe exactly respond to one another; so that when one is at one end he may see all that is done at the other, & the view passing through all these several places, finds its a very agreeable sight: but above all the rest, the Gallery pleases infinitely. Imagine, that it is so contriv'd as to serve for a Gallery and a Cabinet both; for the Architect took room out of the thickness of the wall, at several distances, to place shelves fill'd with books. The like have been made on the side of the Bay-windows; and for the safety and neatness of the books, there are Curtains which cover them, and great carved Windows which enclose them. This Gallery is vaulted, which renders it agreeable and cool. It has several Bay-windows which look towards the Garden, where are seen abundance of Orange-trees; and on each side and at both ends are seen at equal distances twenty great looking-glasses fastned into the Wainscot which is wholly of Cedar. But to render this sight more agreeable, on the side of each of these great looking-glasses there are other little ones, with branches of silver issuing out at the bottom, each of which supported two stately stately Lamps. So that when these sixty or eighty Lamps are lighted, the reflection they make in that multitude of Looking-glasses, produces such an admirable spectacle as cannot be represented. And to render this place as commodious as it is handsome, the Cabinet which is at the end remote from the Haven of Syracusa has such a semblance of melancholy and solitude, that it is impossible not to be pensive in it. Two steps downward lead into it, it is of no great largeness, the prospect of it is bounded, and there is a shadiness so furable to a solitary retreat, that never was any place so fit to muse agreeably or better contriv'd to tell a secret in, as this. But contrarily, the other Cabinet which is opposite to this, at the other end of this apartment, being in view of the Haven, diverts the eyes with a thousand delightful Objects, and a continual diversity of people going to and fro. So that here is always a choice either of Solitude or of the World; and which is more remarkable, this apartment without many adornments or gilding makes nevertheless such a shew of magnificence as cannot be express'd.

After what you have said (answer'd Plotina) I am more desirous than before of the friendship of the generous Amalthea, and the charming Clarissa. I will not fail (reply'd Merigenes) to request it for you, and I confidently promise you to obtain it, as soon as I shall have told them who you are. But would you not also (said Merigenes) be Friend to some of my Friends of this Country? I desire it (answer'd she smiling) for according to the humor I am of, I am not very well satisfied with all those I have here. Sincerely (added she) if we well consider, all the World are are but dissemblers; they whom we confide in most, deceive us most, and I think 'tis good prudence to distrust all others and our selves too. For all the World act like the vulgar at some time or other, all the World commits faults, and all the World is to blame in some cases. They who seem active, are deceivers; such as are not deceivers are weak; they that are too wise, love nobody; and they that love really are so few, that they make no remarkable number. Never tell me then (added Plotina speaking of some Friends) such a one is a wise man, generous, and incapable of failing; for to speak truly, all men are subject to defects. Yes (continued she with an amiable severity) all the World may be prepossessed with prejudice, all the world is crafty, envious, slanderous, false, weak; and there is scarce a Heroe but in some moment of his life finds some little low and vulgar sentiment in his heart; so true it is that all men have their imperfections. In truth (said Anacreon) Plotina has reason in what she says, for there is scarce any person that can boast of having a true Friend. Then I am more happy than others (said Merigenes) for I believe I have many. I believ'd so as well as you (answer'd Anacreon) but upon an occasion of some importance, when I was at the Court of Polycrates, I found I had an infinite number of false or weak Friends, and very few whom I could account good. 'Tis so in all places (reply'd Amilcar) but in prudence it behoves never to confide in their Friendship further than their own interest, pleasure, or glory ties them to you; and in equity it behoves to love them in the same measure as they love us, and never with any other affection than that which increases and diminishes according to occasion. But Heroical friendship is not much less difficult to be practis'd than constant Love; and for my part, I have rarely endeavour'd it, because the former is more convenient. 'Tis true, 'tis not so noble, excellent, and solid; but it never causes us much perplexity; it never makes us partakers of the misfortunes or sorrows of our friends; it never renders us concern'd in the injuries which are done them; but taking barely the flowers of friendship (if I may so speak) we leave the thorns to those sincere Friends, who resent all the sorrows of those they love, who engage in all their interests without exception, who maintain the same courageously against the World, who have no fortunes apart, whose very honour is mutually common, who can never be poor whilst one of them is rich, who think themselves not in health when their friends are sick. Believe me (added Amilcar) this kind of friendship is not competent to all sorts of people, and I know some persons that have not been able to attain to it, though they much desir'd it. And therefore for fear of the same miscarriage, I content my self with loving according to the fashion, that is, very commodiously for my self. To conclude, whatever Merigenes is pleas'd to say, he knows no great number of those Herbes in Friendship. For my part (said Plotina) I desire no more of him but the Character of one; for I conceive he must needs be a very agreeable person, it being almost impossible to be perfectly a good Friend, without being perfectly a brave man. I grant it (said Merigenes) and I assure my self, that as soon as I shall have named Lysimantus, Amilcar will confess he is an excellent man, and a faithful Friend. I acknowledge it (answer'd Amilcar) and that which renders his friendship more solid, is, that he is indued with an immutable honesty; and as for constancy, he has given a thousand eminent proofs of it, and lov'd the illustrious Meriander, even to the death. Since Lysimantus was Friend to Meriander, and is so still to Merigenes; (said Valeria) we must needs know, and I joyn my self with Plotina to desire his description. I do the same (said Clelia) and I assure my self, Merigenes will not refuse us. It would be sufficiently hard to do it, Madam (reply'd he) and therefore to obey you, know, Lysimantus is a man of illustrious Lineage, and whose Ancestors have born the most considerable Charges in their own Country. But to speak truly, he is so well worthy to be commended by himself, that 'tis not at all necessary to fetch his praises from the virtues of his predecessors, and it suffices to speak only of what is truly his own. He is tall, of a goodly aspect; time has a little thickned his shape; he has a fresh and lively complexion, handsome and sprightly eyes, something a great nose, a happy Physiognomy, the air of a Wise man, and a very obliging address, especially towards his Friends. Nature has given him a great Wit, but solid and firm, with a very exact judgment of the highest matters. Not but that he has a pliable mind, which obliges him not to despise the meaner, for he speaks well in the most trivial things when he pleases to give himself the trouble; but it is certain, his mind is naturally more fit for serious matters. He has an universal knowledge of the World, which scarce ever deceives him; he understands the soundest Policies, and the most solid morality. By his prudence he foresees the most remote and least probable events; and his firmness of mind causes him to support constantly the most unexpected misfortunes. He knows how to undergo the changes of Fortune without changing his countenance; exile and imprisonment shake not the firm-

firmness of his heart; and never studying but to do that which he ought, he leaves events to the power of Fortune, and always prepares himself for the most prosperous, that so he may not be surpriz'd by them. He is honorable, honest, punctual, secret, and as great a friend as possibly can be. His manners are very innocent; yet his virtue is nothing austere towards others; but on the contrary, he conceives the wiser a man is, the more he is oblig'd to excuse the light follies of his Friends. He is naturally inclin'd to ambition and action, but his virtue renders him so absolute a Master of his mind, that he conforms himself admirably well to moderation and quiet. 'Tis true, this quiet is sufficiently honourable to him; for his virtue, and his great love of justice and truth being known to all the world, he is the comforter of his unfortunate friends, the umpire of many great contests, and the depository of the last wills of divers eminent, who would be assur'd at their death to have their intentions perform'd. For Lyfimantus is incapable of bending for any respect whatsoever, when he sees virtue does not require it; and indeed all the Grandeur of the World, nor death it self cannot make him demur a moment to do his duty. He believes a man is not oblig'd to be happy, but is oblig'd to be virtuous; and he thinks he should be more miserable if he could reproach himself with an action of weakness, than if he were expos'd to the most cruel persecution that ever was. In which regard he confines himself so scrupulously to do what he ought, that he can never fail in it; and friendship, as powerful as it is in his heart, has never been able to cause him to omit the least thing which he thought himself oblig'd in honour to do, though it were in the most nice and difficult occasions. Nevertheless, he loves his Friends very tenderly; for, being Love in general never much touch'd his heart, though he may be not incapable of a great passion, his Friendship is thereby the more ardent and tender. But how strong soever it be, the love of glory and virtue have always the greatest influence upon him. 'Tis true, he does not flatter himself with self-conceit in these occasions, nor make a pretext of justice to the disadvantage of Friendship; but he so well understands the just bounds of generosity, justice, and friendship, that he is never mistaken in them. Nevertheless, he has a virtue which he is troubled to give bounds to in his heart. For he believes goodness ought almost never to have any, and therefore he makes a particular profession of being good; and this is so much the more excellent, in that having a very high Soul, his goodness has nothing in it but what is noble, and can never be suspected of weakness. Were I minded, I could relate to you a hundred eminent actions of this illustrious man, which would confirm that which I say; but since I know he loves not to have his actions publish'd, I shall conform to his humor, and deprive you of a very great pleasure by depriving him of a great glory. But though I forbear to tell you any thing of his life, yet I shall at least inform you that he was dearly lov'd by the illustrious Meriander (whom you have heard so much spoken of) and is infinitely so at present by the generous Theander, the prudent Theodamas, the agreeable Teramus, the ingenious Amilcar, the illustrious Herminius (whom he saw at Syracusa) and by a man of eminent worth call'd Clidamantus, who has a high and tender heart, a very great capacity, with all noble inclinations, who is very sensible of Love and Friendship, who is honourable and generous, who writes excellently both in Verse and Prose, who cannot submit to any thing but Reason, whose Will is ardent in whatsoever he effects, who is decent and magnificent, and who by a thousand great and excellent qualities has deserv'd the friendship of Lyfimantus. I am ravish'd with this Character of your illustrious Friend (answer'd Plotina) but I beseech you, tell me whether Meleander lov'd him always alike till his death. He so tenderly lov'd him (reply'd Merigenes) that he left him his portrait, and made choice of him to execute his last intentions. Nevertheless an adventure once befel them worthy to be related to you, which might have bred a feud betwixt them, if both of them had not had well-temper'd minds, and in which honour and friendship made a great contest in the heart of Lyfimantus. I beseech you (said Clelia) tell us that adventure. I will so (answer'd Merigenes) on condition the company will afterwards declare their sentiments concerning the action of my Friend. I scruple not to engage my self to this (reply'd Clelia) for I perceive in the eyes of all that hear me they will do what you desire. Know then (said Merigenes) there was never a straiter friendship than that which was between Lyfimantus and Meriander; for they had a great mutual affection and esteem, and had no distinct interests. Being in this condition, Fortune engag'd them to follow a great Prince into a strange Country, where having continued a sufficient long time, it hapned that this Prince's affairs becoming in another posture, he took a resolution to depart secretly out of the Country whither he had retir'd, and discover'd his purpose to Lyfimantus and some other besides, with order to tell no person whatsoever of it, and to steal away with himself the next night, without giving intelligence of it to any. Lyfimantus then found himself in an extreme plunge; for on the one side honour requir'd him to be faithful to his Master, and on the other friendship would not permit him to desert his Friend in a strange Country, where he might be ill treated, or at least arrested after the departure of the Prince. However, though Lyfimantus lov'd Meriander more than his own life, yet believing he could not reveal his Master's secret without perfidiousness, he told Meriander nothing of it, and resolv'd to go with the Prince till he had conducted him into a place of safety, and to return afterwards to find his Friend and partake of the same Fortune with him, how bad soever it might prove. The business was done accordingly; Lyfimantus followed the Prince, and Meriander stay'd behind, and was extremely astonish'd at the departure of his Friend. But having a good opinion of the heart of his Friend, he complain'd rather of his own misfortune than of him, and took it not ill that honour had been more prevalent in his mind than friendship, and that not being able to satisfy the one without violating the other, he had prefer'd his duty before all things. Wherefore having found out a way to escape, and gone to seek the Prince upon the frontier, from whence his Friend was ready to return back to him, he was so generous as not to make him the least reproach. On the contrary he embrac'd him with ardency; and when Lyfimantus would have told him what a sorrow it was to him to have been prohibited by his duty from revealing the secret to him wherewith he had been intrusted, I beseech you (said he) have not so sad an opinion of me as to suspect that I blame you; for if I did, it would imply that I might be capable of a Treason. Do not then treat me me in this manner, I conjure you, and believe that if I had been in your place, I should have done as you have: but if any alteration has hapned in my heart, 'tis that I esteem you more than I did before. Ha! Meriander (cry'd Lyfimanus) this action of yours is far more excellent than mine; and if you have encreas'd your esteem of me, I am oblig'd to augment (if possible) my affection for you.

Ha! Merigenes (cry'd Plotina) that which you relate seems to me so excellent, so noble and heroical, that my reason is dazled with it. And sincerely (added she) I know not which deserves the greater admiration, Lyfimanus or Meriander. For my part (said Clelia) I judge Meriander to have taken a very commendable course: but since there was no other in reason to be taken, and since that which Lyfimanus did, was more difficult to resolve on, I conceive more praises are to be given to Lyfimanus than to Meriander. If you please to consider (said Anacreon) you will find it a greater difficulty to keep our selves from being sway'd by our own interests, and to judge equitably in favour of a Friend when we are both judges and parties. But however (said Valeria) the matter was not very ambiguous; for no man ought ever to betray his Master in favour of a Friend. 'Tis true (answer'd Amilcar) but there are so many people who betray their Masters for considerations less noble, that a man cannot be too much commended who did what he ought at such a time, when he could not do it without exposing his Friend to be arrested in a strange Country. But yet I would know (said Plotina) when 'tis lawful to desert one's Friend. Never (said Valeria) but being 'tis forbidden for a man to be perfidious to his Master, in some occasions there may be a necessity of declining to serve his Friends as he desires. But to speak truth, these unhappy occasions are few; for it is requisite that they be indispensable duties, and such as are required toward our Prince, Father, or Country: nevertheless at the same time we ought to be capable of entering into all the interests of those we love, and to be sensible of whatever concerns them: it is requisite that their honour be mingled with our own, and that we be more ready to pardon injuries done to our selves than to our Friends. Finally, we ought positively to do more for our Friend than we would do for our selves. By what Merigenes has related (said Clelia) it appears that Lyfimanus thought himself oblig'd even to perish with his Friend, since he resolv'd to return where he had left him; and 'tis easie to judge what he was capable of doing for him, by what he would have done against himself, lest his Friend might suspect him of too little affection. But that which I account most praise-worthy in Meriander (added Valeria) is, that he believ'd his Friend when he told him of his intention to return, and that without doubting a moment of what he said. For 'tis one of the greatest priviledges of Friendship to believe a Friend, as we would be believ'd by him. For if you think him capable of dissimulation, you ought to withdraw your friendship from him; and for my part, I confess, that I am sensibly troubled when that which I say, is doubted of; because I am incapable of lying: besides, as soon as distrust is admitted amongst friends, friendship it self is in danger to be destroy'd. Undoubtedly Valeria has reason (answer'd Amilcar) and there is nothing more disgustful than to call in doubt that which a Friend assures you of, and nothing likewise that more argues the weakness of friendship in him that doubts;

for if he takes his Friend for a sincere person, why does he not believe him? and if he think him false, why does he not discard him? Affuredly 'tis confidence which is the most indissoluble bond of heroical friendship. So Meriander (who was vertue it self) presently believ'd Lyfimanus; and to conclude, it may be said, without determining precisely which of the two deserves most commendations in this occasion, that either of them did all which they ought to do, to merit a greater mutual esteem. In truth (said Plotina then) I think there are not found many such Friends as Lyfimanus and Meriander; and 'tis prudence not to believe lightly that we have found one, for fear of being deceived. For my part (said Amilcar) I am perswaded, that the World has in general been always alike, that there has been always vice and virtue, that what is not in one place is in another. And for what concerns me (said Plotina) I think Merigenes has done a master-piece in entertaining our minds so agreeably with the relation he has made us; for ordinarily narrations somewhat long do not much divert, and the custom of relating such continually ought to be avoided; as I know some who never speak but of the time pass'd, and always recounting what they have seen, say nothing of what they see. 'Tis true (answer'd Amilcar) these eternal tellers of Stories are sometimes much to be fear'd. Some are confus'd, others too long, some are so peevish that they will never be interrupted, others on the contrary interrupt themselves, and at the end know not what they have spoken, nor what they intended to speak: such as recount things that are not much cared for nor delightful in themselves, are more troublesome than the Tellers of Stories. Yet I had one day sufficient pleasure (said Plotina) in playing a prank once in my life in a company where I was; for after they had diverted themselves with a hundred several things, it was concluded to refer the diversifement of the rest of the day to me. Wherefore when they had walkt, danc't and been entertain'd with a sumptuous collation, I thought it would be best to contrive some kind of amusement in the conversation. But being there were some persons in the company of no great Wit, I confess that judging they were not fit to be diverted seriously, I made a malicious piece of railery, which was to engage them all to obey me, and to speak concerning what I pleas'd. And so chusing such subjects for these people to speak of as they understood least, I made them say very pleasant things. For my part (said Valeria) I should be much puzzled if I were obliged to speak of several things which I understand not. And, as for me (said Clelia) I speak not much but of that which affects my heart. For my particular (said Amiclea) I speak indifferently what I have seen; and I what I think (added Merigenes) I am then more dextrous than all you (said Amilcar) for me thinks I speak alike well of every thing. At least you speak sometimes very pleasantly of others (answer'd Plotina) and though you believe you always do wonders (added she) yet I am confident you will not make a description of a handsome place so well as Amiclea. I grant it (reply'd he) but I can boast that I do it better than any thing else, except loving you; for, as for that, I not only surpass others, but I daily surpass my self. I beseech you (said she smiling) do not confound your descriptions, leave that of your affection to another time, and content your self to describe to us some fair House, or Garden, that we may see your skill. But if he describe a place to us which we have not seen (said Valeria) we shall not know whether he describe it well or no. If you will refer your selves to Merigenes (answer'd Amilcar) I will describe one to you, in which your fancy may walk with incredible pleasure; for there is not a fairer in the World. They say 'tis so dry in Africa (reply'd Amiclea) that I hardly think you can make so handsome a description if you chuse a place of your own Country. No, no (answer'd Amilcar) do not fear my judgment, for 'tis at least as great as my Wit. And therefore I shall describe to you a very fair Place in Asia, which I know Merigenes has seen, and which is not far from Babylon. Then 'tis the fair house of Telaſtus and Meliſanta (reply'd Merigenes.) 'Tis the same (said Amilcar.) Your choice is admirable (answer'd Merigenes) and you cannot mistake in the corner of a Walk, but I shall perceive your error. But 'tis a long way from hence to Asia (said Amiclea.) As for the Voyages of the fancie (answer'd Plotina) they are so easily made, that it will be no trouble to me, to go to Babylon in a moment. But how will you know (said Valeria) whether Amilcar represents a place well which you never saw, and never will? 'Tis sufficient (answer'd she) that I see whether he knows how to make a handsom Idea of a fair place; he that so much derides those that put the Bases upon the Chapters: for as for my own part, I confess to my shame, when I have been in a brave Garden, I could say nothing of it but that it was extremely handsome, delightful, and admirable. Then I shall excel you (answer'd Amilcar) and to manifest so much, attend to me silently, and have a little patience. If I would make a bare plat-form, I should soon have done; but intending to make you a faithful Portraiture, I must desire a little time. Yet I confess ingenuously, the place I am going to describe to you, which is called Mount Euphrates, has such extraordinary Beauties, that I think it impossible to delineate them well. It is so near Babylon, that it requires but a quarter of an hour to go thither, 'Tis true, the mountain upon which it is situated, is a little towards the right side of the City, but nevertheless, there is no difficulty at all in the way; besides, if one pleases to go a little about, there is a way leads to it, the slopeness of which is almost imperceptible. As for the Building, it has nothing very magnificent on the outside, but it is admirably commodious within. The apartments of it are handsome; there are Halls, Chambers, Galleries, and so pleasant, convenient, and agreeable a Cabinet, that nothing can be desired more in it. For after having passed through a great Hall, and a handsome Chamber, one enters into it by a carved Door, the borders of which are gilded. The form of this Cabinet is square, it is painted and gilded all about, and on three sides of it are Looking-glasses with gilded frames, which by reflection receive all the Objects of the most goodly Country that ever was seen, and of one of the fairest Gardens in the World; so that sitting upon the rich Cushions which are about it, or upon a little Couch which is on the side opposite to the Door, one sees on all sides a most agreeable sight. For these several Looking-glasses not only give several representations of a brave Country, a Garden, and the square Ponds of water, as well as the Company which is in it; but they multiply themselves, and by the diversity of their reflexions agreeably deceive the eyes, and pleasingly amuse the imagination. And to make an end of describing this admirable Cabinet, I shall tell you, that there is a kind of a shelf, in form of a Cornish which lyes round about above the Looking-glasses. This shelf is painted and gilded, like all the rest of the Cabinet, and several curious and magnificent vessels are seen upon it. But that which chiefly renders this Cabinet admirable, is, that it has a large Bow-window from whence is seen all that which I am going to describe to you. But to do it well, it is requisite to return back the same way, to the end to represent to you all that is perceiv'd in an instant, when having gone through a very handsome passage, and cross'd a great Court, one arrives at the Porch, and advances up the steps. Conceive then, that one is no sooner arriv'd at the place I speak of, but there is discovered the fairest sight in the World, for to omit speaking of a great Terrass walk which lies between two agreeable Groves, I will only tell you that it is a stately stone Balcone, beyond which is seen a large green plat with divisions and borders of Flowers round about, and three Walks on the two sides of it, as it were to lead the sight to a fair Fountain, which is so much the more admirable, for that it is plac'd upon the top of a Mount. Beyond this Fountain which has a very stately Basin, is another green plat made Terrass-wise, with three stately entrances of stone-work, and two large square lakes of water on the right and left side, almost as if Nature had invert'd her order by placing lakes upon Hills, they are so great and handsome. 'Tis true, in approaching towards them, 'tis visible enough that Art has assisted Nature, for they are encompass'd with stone, the sides of them are green turf, and there are low walks to go round about them, the borders of which are covered with perpetual verdure. So that these Ponds of water having each of them five Fountains arising up with sharp spires, make a very agreeable Object with that Fountain in the middle I told you of before. Below this there is a third Terrass'd green plat, more rustical than the second, from whence being descended by other stone stairs, one sees a Round of water with several Jets of Water, Rocks, Prishing-spouts, Napes, and all that the industry of men can add to Nature. But to bring back your imagination to the Porch (if I may so speak) and make you well comprehend that which is seen there, know, that besides the first and second green-plat, the Fountain in the middle, and the two square lakes of water, the prospect reaches to above twenty miles distance, though the sight be agreeably arrested by a very delectable variety. For beyond the inclosure of the park is seen a hill on the left hand, which is cultivated by husbandry, and in stead of hindring the sight, leads it towards the fairest Object in the world; for there is discovered a Royal House standing in a Plain, which has several stately Towers of ancient structure; and another proud modern Building, which one of the chief men of the World caus'd to be built there, to render this place more fit for the divertisement of a great Prince. This Castle is accompanied with a great Wood, which is discover'd likewise, and is a marvellous ornament to the Country. More towards the right hand is seen another fair House, which belongs to a man very illustrious both for his eminent Charges, and his great Qualities. And a little nearer is seen a Temple, in which are Virgins consecrated to Diana, and several other Houses of Persons of Quality are discerned, which which adorn this Countrey with an agreeable variety. Beyond these fair Objects, which seem to serve chiefly to render the Prospect from Mount Euphrates more divertizing, is seen an admirable Plain which shews as if it were united with the sky; and on the right hand is seen the top of a rustick Temple, solitary plains, hills, copses, heaths, interjacent fields, and remote mountains, which rising insensibly one above another, withdraw themselves out of view by their distance. In brief, this sight is so surprizing and excellent, that one cannot be but continually amaz'd and charm'd with it. However, I must change my station, and conduct you from the left side of the Porch into a great Walk which runs through a side of the Grove, and is cross'd by two other very solitary walks, in the concourse of which is a Fountain in the midst. Going towards which, one finds on the right hand a little end of a Walk, which suffering the sight to pass through the trees that reach up to the Sky, discovers at a distance the Royal House I mention'd, the prospect of which is so agreeable. But when amongst the sweet warblings of a thousand Birds who are the perpetual guests of this pleasant wood, you arrive at the Fountain, you find your self in the midst of several Walks, and in an admirable place. That which continues directly from the House, at the end rises up into a little Hill, and hath a Copsie on the left side, and a spacious Meadow on the right. If one look towards the side where the sight is free, one sees the same Countrey I have described to you, but with another aspect; because by changing place, all the objects appear after a different manner. But after this, turning to the contrary side you behold the shadiness of the Wood, and pass into another Walk from whence is seen on the left hand a Meadow between two Woods, which is the most agreeable sight in the World; and on the right, another Meadow, and a little further a Copsie. At the end of this Walk, one enters into a great Walk of the Wood, the Trees of which are so shady that they wholly intercept the rays of the Sun. From this place is a very agreeable prospect, for this walk at one end terminates in a kind of perspective and rising at the other between two handsome Copses, one mounts up a little Hill where are four Walks, and where the sight is so free that one would think himself master of the World. On one side is seen the same Countrey that was seen from the Porch, and several square Ponds of water; and on the left hand, many brave houses, and a plain of far greater extent. On the one side is seen a corner of Babylon, and the shady Woods; and on the other a rustick Temple, all Assyria, the proud Monuments of the ancient Kings of this Countrey, Villages, Towns, Cottages, Valleys and Mountains afar off, and so great an extent of Land, that the sight being unable to discern any thing more, the imagination supplies its deficiency, and makes one think he sees that which he does not, because he knows only that things ought to be there. After this you go back the same way, and turning at the bottom of the Hill, you ascend by little rustick solitary Walks which shew as if it were the remotest Desert in the World. All is wild and neglected, there is nothing to be seen there but Trees and shade; nor heard, besides Birds. By the way is seen a little place to take covert, but it was made only to rest in, or avoid the Rain: so that in this place the imagination cannot but be fill'd with solitary objects. But then, having gone some time in these little winding-walks, one arrives at a Walk as high as the Wood. It rises on the side toward the little Hill, and is very open: but at the other end it is very delightful with its shadiness. On the left side are divers cross Walks, which descend by degrees, and whose shew is gloomy and wild. A little further on the same side there is a place so charming, that a Painter could never invent any thing so handsome. And there is another, the objects of which, though handsome, have an appearance of solitariness that pleases infinitely. But without stopping at so many places, I must proceed to tell you, that having gone some time in this high Walk, one sees at the end a kind of shew, which at first is so confus'd, that 'tis not discernable what it is; but going further one would think he beheld a great River and the Masts of a Navy: a little after, one would imagine, it were some piece of admirable Perspective painted; but in approaching nearer, one finds that they are Towers and Pyramids, and that this is the most goodly and magnificent sight in the World. For through three large Windows which make up the whole side of a Cabinet built with a round arch'd roof, is seen in the plain directly opposite the great and stately City of Babylon, which by the Towers of its Temples, Palaces and hanging Gardens makes a confusion of gallant objects that dazzles and amazes the imagination, especially when the Sun shines upon them in the morning. The admiration this Prospect excites, deprives some of speech, and causes others to make a thousand shours; and the excellency of it cannot be imagined by any but those that have seen it. But the opposition of divers other things seen from the same place renders it more surprizing. For upon hillocks toward the right hand are seen many little Countrey-cottages, a rustick Temple something nearer, a small thicket of trees; on the left Vineyards, and Corn-fields, in the middle spacious and flowry Meadows, and furthest of all, the heads of Mountains crown'd with stately Palaces. And besides all this magnificence, there is a terrass'd Walk six hundred paces long, that affords the same prospect, which undoubtedly is the most admirable in the World. But fear of tediousness persuades me to omit the description of several cross Walks which meet at the entrances of the Cabinet from whence this rare prospect is seen; and not to mention to you the various and admirable prospects of them, I shall only tell you, that descending to the low Walk of the Wood there is an admirable one for variety, and that from thence is seen the same square Pond that was seen from the little Hill which is directly opposite to it. But in brief, being return'd into the low Walk, one goes out of it by great Stairs of stone, crosses the Court, and comes again into the Porch, the goodly prospect from whence comforts you agreeably for all the other fair objects which are no longer seen. But that which is remarkable, they to whom this gallant House belongs (who are noble Babylonians) are so worthy of it, that all the World rejoices to see it in their power. For Telasius and Melisanta his wife are persons of great fame for vertue, in which respect they are highly esteem'd by all people of eminent quality and worth. Telasius is a comely personage, of a brown complexion, and a tall stature; he has a noble air, an agreeable smile, and is extremely civil. His mind is of a good temper, his conversation sincere, his judgment solid, and his capacity fits him for the most considerable employments. His fortune is no doubt very advantageously establish'd: but he uses it so nobly, that no body is envious of his plenty. Whatever can be expected from magnifimagnificence guided by discretion, is to be found in his habitation. His Houses are handsome, his Table is splendid, delicate and neat, he loves worthy persons; and to compleat his felicity, the Gods have given him a Wife whose perfectly noble inclinations corresponding to his own, leave him nothing to desire for his happiness but to have children that may succeed and resemble them. For Melisanta is indu'd with all that can render an excellent woman considerable. She is not tall, but yet she is well made, and has a very agreeable shape. She has brown Hair, a fair and lively complexion, blew Eyes, pretty, cheerful and sprightly. The shew of her countenance is agreeable, her smile very amiable, her Neck well made, her Arms and Hands delicate, and her gestures free and graceful. As for her mind, she is infinitely ingenious, and has a sprightly Wit that exerts itself always in conversation, and never suffers her to be pensive. She has a quick and ready Fancy; she speaks very exactly and easily upon all occasions; she makes a divertizing relation in the most pleasant manner possible; and her memory is so faithful to her, that I once heard her repeat a Discourse made by the most Eloquent of the Babylonian Magi, without varying scarce any thing from it. As for her judgment, the conduct of her whole life gives an advantageous proof of it, it not being possible to find a person more solidly virtuous than she. Nothing ever molests her, and she satisfies all kind of duties without solicitude. There is not a woman in Babylon more exact in observing all things pertaining to her Religion; she performs to her Relations all the offices she owes them; she does no less to her Friends, and never failing in any of the different occasions whereto decency or civility engage her, she has yet time enough left to spend in conversations and things indifferent. As for her Address, one would think she was design'd for every thing she does; her Attire is well chosen, her House-furniture is judiciously suted, and when she gives a Collation to her Friends at her fair House in the Countrey, nothing can be desir'd more. Her slaves serve her with order, decency and respect, and she understands the art of giving in the most gallant manner in the World. She has a Friend, to whom one day she made a Present very ingeniously; for having taken notice of a very handsome Picture-case which she wore hanging by a plain string, and this Friend coming to visit her, she took it from her with more dexterity than a Lacedemonian could have done: so that this Lady believing it lost, regretted the loss of it four days together. But at length Melisanta sent her the Case which she griev'd for, causing her to be told that it was recovered out of the hands of thieves; and whereas they had put a chain to it, she conceiv'd she might keep it without scruple, because it was not known to whom to restore it, and no person came to demand it. But indeed this chain, which was of handsome workmanship, and had a very neat clasp belonging to it, was put to the Picture-case by Melisanta, who by this ingenious liberality would make a Present under the colour of a theft. It is for you to judge by this of Melisanta's mind, who besides all I have told you, has yet another admirable quality; for she has a very excellent and charming voice. She sings as well as 'tis possible to sing, and there's no person that hears her, but would think she has a very passionate soul. Yet she is sometimes accus'd of not being sensible enough to friendship, and indeed I think it may be confidently said without doing her injustice, that hers is usually more generous than tender, though I think it not impossible for her to love with great dearth. However, her manner of loving is very commodious to her Friends and glorious to herself, for she is very careful of persons whom she loves; she is officious, gentle, and agreeable, and she has no friend but owes her a thousand civilities and pleasures: in brief, it may be thought that were Melisanta as loving as she is lovely, the friendship born towards her would be so excessive, that it would torment as much as if it were love. Ha! Amilcar (said Plotina) I am extremely taken with Melisanta, and should like better to be with her at Mount Euphrates than in the Camp of Porfenna. However, as I am sincere, I confess you are as great a Painter of Landships as Pourtraitures; but before I commend so much as I desire, Merigones must tell me, whether Telastus, Melisanta, and Mount Euphrates are such as you represent them. They are so like (answered Merigones) that there is nothing more exact. All that Amilcar has spoken, has much diverted me (said Valeria) but I should not counsel another to make so long a narration, unless he could perform it as well. That which I admire (said Amiclea) is, that Amilcar has so accurately retain'd all the particularities of so excellent a place. As for that (answer'd he) wonder not; for you must know, that all handsome Objects make so strong an impression in my mind, that they never are extinguish'd. But I declare to you freely that in an ordinary conversation I should not have made my relation so long; for it is not fit to impose silence to a whole Company, only to shew that one knows how to speak. After this, Amiclea withdrawing, the rest of the company departed, so that Clelia, Plotina and Valeria being left alone, the two latter perceived that Clelia's melancholy was still more augmented. What's the matter? my dear Sister (said Plotina to her) What new cause produces this sadness? Clelia blusht at this speech, and would have pass'd it without answering; but Valeria pressing her thereto, Is it possible (said she to them) that you have not apprehended by the end of Amiclea's relation that Zenocrates is jealous of Aronces and Lysimena? and that you know not, that this being join'd to all the other conjectures I have of my unhappiness, I have ground to believe that Aronces is unfaithful, and that whilst I obstinately reject Horatius's affection, he is unconstant to mine? To shew you (reply'd Plotina) that I am sincere, though I am Sister to Horatius, and think he is worthy of your love, yet I do not stick to assure you that Aronces is innocent, and that your jealousy is as ill grounded as that of Zenocrates. But who knows (said Clelia) whether Aronces does not consent to the order which he has receiv'd, not to see me? for by this means we shall be sent back to Rome without his seeing me, and when I shall be return'd thither, perhaps he will write to me that he could not disobey the King his Father; and so without being expos'd to my reproaches, he will forget all his Oaths, and perhaps love me no more. But if this misfortune should happen (added she blushing with) I find I should hate Aronces as much as I have lov'd him, and this bare suspicion I have of him, causes such a confus'd trouble in my heart, that I cannot distinguish what sentiments I have in my Soul. As Clelia was speaking in this manner, Lucilius enter'd, and seem'd to them very sad. So that Plotina being solicitous concerning the cause of his

his sadness, askt him hastily, what the matter was. Alas ! Madam (said he sighing) I am unwilling to tell you. Clelia and Valeria blurr, and looking upon Lucilius, Is it (said Valeria) because the peace is disturb'd by the artifices of Tarquin? Or is it (added Clelia) because Porfenna instead of keeping us for Hostages, determines to treat us like prisoners? No, Madam (answered he) but 'tis because he has caus'd the Prince to be arrested, without any known cause, and seems extremely incens'd against him. How? (said Clelia in a great surprize) is Aronces arrested by Porfenna's Order? Yes, Madam (answered he) and the Camp is so mov'd, all the World is so astonish'd, and the Queen, and the Princess of the Leontines so afflicted at it, that it is impossible to express to you the universal consternation occasion'd thereby. Clelia sigh'd at these words, which at the same time redoubled both her discontents and her suspicions. But is it not imagin'd (said she) for what reason he is arrested? Not at all (answered Lucilius) all that is known, is, that ever since the cruel Tullia had so private a conference with Porfenna, he has been sufficiently pensive and sad; that yesterday there came several men from that Prince, with whom Porfenna conferr'd in private; and that soon after he caus'd the Prince to be arrested, and absolutely commanded he should not be suffer'd to speak to any person. So that, Madam, I do not see, how he can so much as give any intelligence of himself to those he loves most. Porfenna has also appointed that you be guarded with more care than ordinary, though he has commanded too, that you be always served with respect.

The Queen and the Princess of the Leontines being desirous to speak concerning the Prince to Porfenna, he told them with sufficient roughness, that when they knew his offence, they would hate him as much as they lov'd him; and till he could declare it to them, he desir'd them not to speak of him more. This I conceiv'd fit to let you know, Madam (added Lucilius) to the end that if you know anything that may be prejudicial or advantageous to Aronces, you might make use of it as you judge convenient. Alas ! Generous Lucilius (reply'd she) I know nothing, saving that I am unhappy, and that if Aronces be no more criminal towards me than towards Porfenna, he is the most innocent of all men. A little while after this, Telanus brought a Letter from Aronces to Clelia, in which she found these words.

The unfortunate Aronces to the Incomparable Clelia.

I Know not what I am accus'd of, Madam; but I know well; I have done nothing but lov'd you, since I began to be yours. Therefore pity me, I conjure you; and whatever befalls me, be as faithful as I am.

Clelia read this Letter with a strange agitation of mind; and Telanus having promis'd her to endeavor to deliver her answer to the Prince, before his Guards were absolutely settled, she writ and gave him her Letter: after which, being unable to dissemble her grief, she retir'd till Lucilius and Telanus were gone. But as soon as they were departed, Who ever saw (said she to Valeria and Plotina) a more unhappy person than I am? for I pass not one day without some new misfortune. 'Tis but a moment since I was so far jealous as almost to hate Aronces, and at present I so commiserate his unhappiness, as to wish my self prisoner in his room. For if it were so, he might deliver me; whereas I am able to do nothing but pity him, and pity him unprofitably. But after all, if I cannot cease to be unhappy, I may perhaps at length cease to live; there being no likelihood that I shall be always able to overcome grief. Valeria and Plotina did all they could to comfort her, but with no effect; and Clelia having pass'd the rest of the day in complaint, spent all the night in sighing.

CLELIA:

The Fifth and last Part.

BOOK II.

THE imprisonment of the illustrious Arances, as it produc'd a passionate sorrow in the breast of Clelia at the Camp, so it excited a secret joy in that of Horatius at Rome; it being not possible for a rival, how generous soever, not to be glad for such a misfortune as may conduce to render him happy. And in order hereunto, he urg'd Publicola and the second Consul with much importunity to expedite the performance of the Treaty. Herminius also was no less earnest for it; to the end he might see Valeria return: but as for Emilius, Mutius, and Spurius, they would have rather chose never to see their Mistress again, than to be spectators of Herminius happiness by her Nuptials. Octavius being become amorous of Hermilia, ardently desir'd that the peace were concluded; Clelia also wish'd it impatiently, that he might cause Clelia to marry Horatius; and all the Romans in general, unwillingly induring that Tarquin and Tullia were still so near Rome, made continual vows for the accomplishment of the peace. As for Artemidorus, he recovered so fast in a few days, that his Physicians affirm'd he would shortly be able to go abroad; and in the mean time the Princess of the Larentines signified to him that she would visit him speedily about an important Affair, but her presence being necessary at Porfenna's Court for serving Arances, she could not exactly set the time. This Message extremely discontented Zenocrates, whose mind being prepossess'd with jealousy, he believ'd that the cause of deferring to visit a Brother, could be no other than to serve a lover and not a friend. On the other side Berelisa and Clidamira seeing Artemidorus recover'd, made a resolution to go to Præneste, and Anacreon offer'd himself to accompany them. In the interim, all the most vertuous Gallants at Rome continually convers'd with these two fair persons in the absence of Clelia and Valeria. But for that their interests were extremely cross, it was easie to perceive that their hearts always dissented, though they liv'd very civilly together. As for Amilcar, though Plotina were not at Rome, and that considering the nature of Love, it may seem his heart ought to have been at the Camp, because his Mistress was there; yet he did not cease to divert himself upon occasion, and to laugh at Damon's hatred towards him. for he perceived that he hated him more for having made that deriding Dialogue against the sect of Pythagoras, than because he was his Rival. Nor did Acrisius love him very well; because he oftentimes hindred him from speaking as much as he desired, and also because he observ'd that he was attended to more favourably than himself. But, as for Horatius, his heart was always fill'd with hope, imagining to himself that when Clelia could no longer hope to marry Arances, she would resolve to obey Clelia. As for Thermistus and Aderigenes, they prepar'd themselves to depart speedily, but in the interim, they were almost continually with Clidamira and Berelisa, to whom also Cesonia frequently resorted. The imprisonment of Arances no doubt was sensibly regretted by all that knew him, and even by such too as had only heard of his fame; but being they judg'd not that he was obnoxious to any criminal accusation, they accounted him only a Prisoner of State, whose life was out of all danger, because he was Son of him that caus'd him to be arrested. Wherefore some of his Friends omitted not to entertain themselves delightfully when occasion was presented; For those people are rarely found, who are deeply sensible of the misfortunes which befall even such as they love, or whose regret is of any long continuance. Compassionate grief is but transient, and soon dispell'd upon the dawning of the least pleasure; and no doubt the number of those persons is very small, who are so generous as to partake sincerely in all the concernments of those they love, and whose hearts are capable of being thoroughly toucht with the sorrows of others. But Amilcar's natural jovialness being an antidote against all sorts of sadness, he was always debonaire, whether he were at Rome or at the Camp; and having gotten a priviledge to himself of speaking the most disgustful truths without offence, he talkt to Berelisa and Clidamira about their differences with all manner of liberty.

liberty. Sometimes he spoke such things to them as, had they not been capable of railery, would no doubt have sufficiently perplexed them, though they were extremely delightful to the hearers. But one day Berelisa said pleasantly to him in the presence of Cesonia, Clidamira and Anacreon, I fear Herminius too much perswaded you to love truth when he discours'd so well against lying; for I have lately observ'd you speak your mind, without scrupling at any thing which you see. Since I do it, without offence to any person (answer'd Amilcar) wherefore do you blame me? I blame you (reply'd Berelisa) because you give an example which will be so badly followed, that all such as would imitate you will be insufferable. For it is more difficult than 'tis believ'd, to jest with Friends without displeasing them. 'Tis true (said Clidamira) usually people go further than is fitting. Indeed (added Anacreon) 'tis not enough to speak plainly that which true reason allows one to speak; for we ought to understand those persons fully beforehand to whom we use freedom of speech. For most frequently, such as love to put jests upon others are least willing to take them; and therefore it behoves to consider such well with whom we converse in that manner, and to chuse the words we make use of; since many times a word a little too hard embitters the pleasing gust of railery. Believe me (said Cesonia) less than a word will sometimes make that change; for only the tone of the voice is sufficient to alter the sence of a speech; a malicious smile turns an innocent jest into a Satyr; and in brief, nothing requires more judgment than to practise railery inoffensively. And for my part I never saw any but Plotina, and Amilcar, that knew how to make this innocent war handsomly, which renders conversation delightful, and which always ends in joy when the practisers of it are good and ingenious. Nevertheless, (answer'd Anacreon) they are in justice to be excus'd who are not so dextrous and agreeable as Plotina and Amilcar. I beseech you, Anacreon (said this ingenious African) do not undertake to praise me; for being both of us make Verses, we shall be liable to be reckon'd among those Poets that commend one another's Verses, though they frequently jar in prose. 'Tis true, this last can never be applyed to us; for I know you speak much better of me than I deserve, and I as much of you as you merit. For my part (said Clidamira) I confess I extremely hate those people who commend all persons and things without distinction, and there is nothing less obliging than profaned praises, which have been employed a thousand and a thousand times in extolling such as ought rather to be blam'd. As for groundless praises (answer'd Berelisa) I hate them as well as you; but I confess I much love to excuse the defects of others. Yet there are some (reply'd Anacreon) who deserve not very well to be excus'd. How shall we know them? (said Clidamira.) It is not very difficult (answer'd Anacreon) for I conceive 'tis more just to excuse the defects which are incident to the condition or age we are of, than those which are opposite to it. As a covetous old man deserves rather to be excus'd, than a young miser; for although 'tis a folly to heap up treasure when a man has not much occasion for it longer, nevertheless, as 'tis a defect frequently attending old age, they that are guilty of it are the more pardonable. By the same reason it ought not to be accounted so strange for an old man to love to recount what he has seen in his youth, and to be addicted to make long stories, as for a young, who having yet scarce seen any thing, affects to be longer in relating that little which he has seen than he was in seeing it. No Question this is very just (said Cesonia;) and I conceive that 'tis fit to excuse the defects not only which seem peculiar to a certain age or condition, but those which are proper to Nations too; for in truth, every people have their faults and vertues. That which you speak, is true (answer'd Cesonia;) But are there any conditions that draw their defects along with them? No doubt there are (reply'd Amilcar) and for example, is it possible for them which are in the chief employments of Commonwealths never to fail of what they promise? Ha! Amilcar (cry'd Berelisa) unhappy are they who are constrain'd by the greatness of their employments to fail frequently of their word; and happy they, who in great Fortunes retain exactly the vertues of private persons, and who for fear of being defective to themselves, are never so to any. However (said Amilcar) I am perswaded those which are in a certain degree, cannot always do all that they desire; and they deserve to be excus'd, if it appear sometimes that they do not do all which they ought, because very often we are very ignorant of that which may serve to justify them. But to speak a little less seriously, is it not true that when a Lover is long absent from his Mistress, if he happens to meet with some fair person who seems to tell him by her looks, that she would not be sorry to be lov'd, he deserves to be excus'd, if sometimes he uses obliging blandishments to her? For my part, I am of your opinion (said Clidamira.) I imagined you would be so (answer'd Berelisa smiling) but for my part, who place fidelity above all things, I assure you I cannot excuse unfaithful Lovers, though I willingly excuse all other weaknesses. Yet there is so great a number of such (reply'd Amilcar) that 'tis in a manner necessary to excuse them, for fear of being oblig'd to blame almost all men. On the contrary (said Berelisa) 'tis because there are too many of them, that we ought to take heed of excusing them, for fear of encreasing the number, which is already but too great. As for me (said Clidamira) I believe there are more of them than 'tis thought, for I know some who hold it for a Maxim, that constancy is always to be talk'd of, but inconstancy practis'd when any favourable occasion is offer'd for it. For my part (said Anacreon) I conceive it would be more gallant to make a shew of greater inconstancy than we practise in reality. And, as for me (said Amilcar) I conclude that we ought to do that always which pleases us, without considering whether we are constant or inconstant, because pleasure (to speak properly) consists not in the things which we do, but only in doing our own wills. For example, I confess that were I to have a long love in a place where I could have no other, I think, that to avoid the lukewarmness of long loves, I should renew the ardor of my passion by making now and then some small quarrel with my Mistress, so as almost to break quite off with her, and our reconciliation would seem to me a kind of novelty. You are too ingenious by half (said Berelisa) and I doubt not but if Plotina continue long at Porfenna's Camp, you will seek to comfort your self at Rome with some fair one, when you shall be constrain'd to come hither. Ha! charming Berelisa (cry'd he) do not too cruelly taunt me; but believe I have more love for Plotina than I had for six other Mistresses which I had one day at once. I perceive (said Anacreon then) 'tis fit that I interrupt

rupt this discourse a little, and demand of the Company, Wherefore, since Love is a sentiment so universal that Nature never fails to inspire it, men have offer'd to condemn it, or at least to make so great a Mystery of it? To render it more delightful (answer'd Amilcar hastily) for without the several formalities that are us'd in it, Love would not be that which it is. Besides, to speak sincerely (added he) Ceremonies make up the principal beauty of many things; for example, separate a sacrifice from the Temple, the Altar, the Wood-pile, the holy Vessels and Knives, the fillets of the Victims, and Garlands of Flowers which crown them, and you will see nothing but a miserable animal, which is no fairer than another of its kind; for many times men are so wicked as to make but a bad choice of Victims. I beseech you (said Cesonia then) do not confound things thus; let us jest about love as much as you please, but never mingle Religion amongst your follies, for you have too much wit to do as some young people, new-come into the World, who think nothing so fit to produce them the reputation of great capacities, as to disdain the sentiments of their Fathers. Than which nothing is more contrary to true reason, or which sooner makes a man be look'd upon as a fantastick. Indeed (said Berelisa) it behoves never to make a particular way to ones self in these matters, the wiser sort of people ought to be constantly followed in the ordinary path, and we ought not to go wandring out of a conceit to find one more commodious. But let us take heed we do not wander too much our selves (said Amilcar laughing) for we are far from the beginning of our discourse, which was concerning the art of jesting with Friends. We are not very far from it (reply'd Cesonia smiling) for in speaking as you do, you employ your railery upon me, and teach me how to use it towards others. As Cesonia was speaking thus, one came to advertise Amilcar, that a stranger was newly arriv'd at his Lodgings, who desir'd to speak with him with much earnestness. Whereupon he was constrain'd to go away thither. Presently after, Themistius enter'd, and told the company there was a report that Porfenna accus'd Aronces of a horrible crime: a moment after, Herminius came, and said he had heard the same thing, but added, that whatever the rumor meant, he was strongly perswaded that Aronces was innocent.

What then is it (said Berelisa) which they accuse him of? she had scarce pronounced these words when the Princess of the Leontines enter'd, who having first been to see Artemidorus, came to Clidamira's lodgings to see Berelisa. As soon as the first Ceremonies were over, I beseech you, Madam (said Herminius to her) be pleas'd to gratifie the company so far as to tell them whether it be true that the King of Hetruria accuses his Son of a horrid crime. Alas! (answer'd she sighing) 'tis but too true, that he accuses him for having held intelligence with Mutius in designing his death; and some body has so strongly perswaded him that this unfortunate Prince was carried by an excess of love to conspire against him, that the Queen of Hetruria and my self have no small trouble to restrain his indignation. How! Madam (said Herminius) is it possible for Porfenna to suspect the most vertuous Prince in the World of having had such a design as this! Yes (answer'd she) and the case is so much the more cruel, because he will not yet tell by what way he came to be perswaded of this belief. Although none doubts, but that 'tis a contrivance of the cruel

Tullia. But can credit be given to a Woman (said Cesonia) that has pass'd with her Chariot over the body of her Father? It seems she is believ'd (answer'd the Princess) being Aronces is a prisoner, and Porfenna yesterday said openly, the Prince his Son was a Particide. Wherefore being desirous to serve him in all that I am able (added she) I am come to see the Prince my Brother, to get him to go to Mutius and oblige him to assist us to justifie Aronces, who is accus'd of being an abettor of his intended assassinate. But as ill fortune will have it, though Artemidorus has sent to enquire for him at his own house, he is not to be found in any place. Yet I met him last night in the streets (said Herminius) I saw him too (added Themistius) but it was out from my Windows this morning, and he was on horse-back in a Countrey-habit with two slaves only. If he be gone far (answer'd Lyfmena) it will prove ill for Aronces; for his absence would be interpreted as a flight, and he would be thought to have conspir'd with him, instead of designing only to deliver Rome. And therefore (added it) it is very fit to inquire at his house whither he is gone. I shall take that upon me (said Herminius) for one of my attendants is a great Camrade of one of his. And accordingly Herminius sent one of his followers forthwith to get information of that which Lyfmena desir'd to know. But word was brought her, that having had a long conversation with Publicola, he departed very discontented, without acquainting any whither he went. This caus'd much regret in all the company. However I cannot (said Herminius then) think it possible that Porfenna will put Aronces to death. I will not believe it (answer'd the Princess of the Leontines) but I cannot choose but fear it. Nevertheless Porfenna is a very noble Prince, and indu'd with humanity; but the cruel Tullia terrifies me, and all the Tarquins (saying Titus) make me apprehensive of the worst. 'Tis true, there are divers eminent persons which protect Aronces; for the generous Melintha takes all opportunities to serve him, and the fair Hesilia who lives with Galerita, does no less. Lucilius and a Brother of his, are as careful of his interests; Titus and Talanus employ all their endeavours for him, and the Lovers of Terentia, and Anrelisa omit nothing that may conduce to his assistance. As for Galerita, she uses all the prudent arts possible, to serve him; and for my part were I his Sister, I could not do more than I do. But, Madam (said Berelisa) does Clelia know what Aronces is accus'd of? I believe she does (answer'd Lyfmena) and that which renders her more worthy of pity, is, that she is unable to afford the Prince any redress, and that to her discontent, Sextus is again become as amorous of her as ever, and perhaps more than ever he was of Lucretia. So that she is very much to be pity'd; for though Porfenna ought not to violate the Law of Nations, and so 'tis probable the Hostages are in safety in the Camp, yet she has some very disconsolate hours, and the Queen of Hetruria and my self have desir'd Lucilius and Talanus to take especial care of guarding these twenty fair Romans. Since the generous Melintha, Lucilius and his illustrious Brother (reply'd Herminius) are Aronces's friends, I am very much comforted. Being I was not well (said Berelisa) when Lucilius came hither, I did not see him; but I have heard much good spoken of him. Too much you could not (answer'd Lyfmena) and to let you know what manner of persons these two illustrious friends of Aronces are, I will describe them to you. And to begin with him that was not at Rome, whose name is Theomenes; you may know that 'tis not possible to be endu'd with more vertue than he is. I need not tell you that his extraction is noble, for you are not ignorant that he is Brother to the generous Melintha; you know his family is very ancient, and that his Father was a man of eminent worth. As for his personage, he is of an indifferent stature, his Hair is Chestnut, his eyes black, his visage round, and if one well observe it, he has something in his Physiognomy so pretty and good together, and he always smiles so pertinently, that sometimes he makes it appear in a moment that he understands things which could not be related in a day if any one should attempt it. Theomenes has receiv'd from Nature a great stock of wit, especially of that which is judicious and discreet, which examines and sounds the depth of things, which will neither affect nor chuse any thing without knowledge; of that wit, I say, which meddles with nothing without calling the judgment to its assistance. And nevertheless Theomenes wants not a lively and quick fancy, and he is one, whose conjectures resolve the most difficult things with the greatest facility imaginable. I have seen him sometimes in places where you would have said he took no heed to what pass'd, and yet he not only observ'd even the very least things that were spoken or done there, but he divin'd the most secret interests of all that were present in the company. Theomenes has not only a very piercing and solid wit naturally, but he has improv'd it with great diligence. So that he judges well of all things, he accurately understands handsome compositions, and never condemns or applauds any thing, for which he cannot give a good reason. In the beginning of his life he compos'd very amorous and delightful Verses, and he makes such still when he pleases; he speaks very exactly, and his conversation is extremely pleasing. For no argument of discourse comes amiss to him, from Husbandry to Astrology, and from the most jovial Gallantry to the sublimest Policy. And for my part, I have sometimes remain'd astonish'd to see that Theomenes equally well understood both important and inconsiderable affairs, and to find that so wise a man as he, did not neglect to be perfectly inform'd of all the follies of his Age. If the profession Theomenes has chosen had not oblig'd him to a particular restraint, his soul would have been capable of very much love, but such a love as is real, tender, firm and generous together. But his fortune having dispos'd of him after another manner, he understands love at present only in others, but has abandon'd his heart to friendship, which has prov'd very happy to him, for he has many illustrious friends of both sexes, by whom he is greatly esteem'd and belov'd. He is by natural inclination officious, equitable, good and generous. He is exact both in small and great matters, he knows when 'tis fit to engage courageously in the interests of those he loves, to concern himself for their honour, to resent injuries done to them, to love all that they love, to hate all that they hate, and to disdain all such as do not esteem them. He is none of those people who would prevaricate in certain occasions, who would preserve both Friends and Enemies, and who without distinguishing the virtuous from them that are not such, sometimes fail those that never deserted them. On the contrary Theomenes is faithful in all occasions, sincere in all transactions, and always very sensible of whatever concerns his true Friends.

perhaps I insist a little too long in commending Theomenes, for this excellent qualification of his; but I confess 'tis because it is so very rare in these days, and because I believe it necessary for a man of honour. For I conceive when our chief Friends tell us they have enemies to fight with, the first thing to be ask'd them, is, Where they are? and not, Who they are? For, be they who they will, we ought to be absolutely against them. But on the contrary, when Friends of the second Order come to tell us they have enemies, we must first ask them, who they are? that so we may be never in danger of doing any thing against our true Friends, which we know well can never be in the wrong. But as for Theomenes, he so perfectly understands all the rules of true friendship, and his heart is so naturally addicted to follow them, that 'tis scarce possible for him to fail in any of them. Moreover, Theomenes is gentle, sociable, complacent, wise, and discreet. He has both moderation and equity, he conforms himself to the World, and diverts himself with it, and he knows how to enjoy in solitude all the pleasures which it affords. He knows how to make the Court a Theatre to entertain him; and, which is most commendable, he knows so to live there, that his vertue is not alter'd by all the bad Examples which he sees in it. Thus you see what a person Theomenes is, who besides all I have said of him, has so great an inclination to honour all that are indu'd with vertue, that it may be affirm'd, that if he were Master of all the favours which are in Fortunes bestowing, not one virtuous person should have cause to complain of her. For my part (said Berelisa) I am already Theomenes's Friend, though I never saw him. Certainly (said Clidamira) you need no more to gain him than seeing of him, for you never desir'd to get any thing but it became yours. Berelisa is so charming (answer'd Themistius) that the power you say she has is not to be wonder'd at. For my part (said Herminius) who have the honour to know Theomenes, since the making of the Peace, I dare assure that the Princess of the Leontines has not flatter'd him, and that she has made his Picture exactly like. I beseech you, Madam (said Berelisa) tell me too what Lucilius is, who has been so much talk'd of at Rome within these few days. He is such a person (answer'd the Princess of the Leontines) that no Lover, be he never so deserving, but ought to fear having him for his Rival. But since you have not seen this illustrious Brother of Melintha and Theomenes neither, I must tell you that he is of a tall personage, well made, and of a goodly presence. His gesture is sufficiently careless, his air very noble, his access serious and civil, his Physiognomy happy, sage, and agreeable, his hair chestnut, his Visage of a peculiar form, and his Nose a little rising. As for his eyes they are azure, sweet, sprightly, but not great. They have a certain faintness in them too, which renders them very suitable for those passionate glances which make things understood in a moment, and yet they have in some occasions so jolly a smile, that 'tis apparent the heart of Lucilius may as well be capable of a sensible joy, as of a violent grief. His Complexion is good, for a man, and he has a little natural mark under his left Eye, which would well sute with a Beauty, and is graceful to his countenance. Lucilius is neat, he attires himself like a man of Quality, and so as agrees well with his person; and if so worthy a person as he may be commended for small accomplishments, I say, there are many fair Ladies who would wish wish they had hands as white as his. But indeed, I have too much to tell you of his Wit, his Courage, and his Virtue, to detain you longer with the description of his person. Know then, that Nature has been liberal to Lucilius in giving him an extraordinary Wit, a Fancie of unmeasurable extent, and a judgment which so well governs both, that he never speaks any thing in conversation, of which he needs to repent. But indeed his Wit is one of those which might well dispense with learning any thing; because considering things in themselves, their own reflections instruct them better than they can be by all the Books in the world. For which cause Lucilius has spent no great number of years in study; but Travel, War, the Court, and his own Reason have been his Masters. Nevertheless, he has read very much, and there are few excellent pieces of knowledge, which he does not understand; but he has read out of inclination, and not out of obedience, as ordinarily all young persons do, that are design'd to be well educated. However, the Court, War, Travel, and his own Reason have so well instructed him, that 'tis believ'd he owes all his accomplishments to learning; so well he understands all things, and speaks so rationally of every thing that can be offer'd to discourse. Lucilius's particular virtue is an incomparable fortitude, free from all the defects which are incident to the Valiant; for he is a stranger to vanity. He is gentle, civil, and moderate; nor did ever any other hate false glory, and love true, so much as he. Moreover, Lucilius is of an admirable equal temper; for his Friends always find him the same, and though he appears serious, and his constitution inclines a little to melancholy, yet he loves all allowable pleasures. The jollity and mirth of his Friends please and divert him, to which he himself also contributes as much as they desire, and is never refractory towards them. Lucilius has a sense of honour, and generosity, and he is constant in Love and Friendship. He has a firm Soul in adversity; and whereas his Fortune has not been always happy, but he has met with several difficult encounters, been wounded and taken Prisoner in War, travel'd both by Sea and Land, his virtue has been seen to the proof, and 'tis known that he hath come off with honour in all occasions, to which Fortune led him. In brief, Lucilius is valiant amongst the valiant, learned amongst the learned, gallant amongst the Gallants, and equally prudent towards all. His Natural inclination has always carried him to Poetry and Love, and these two sentiments are so much the more ingrafted in his heart, for that they subsist there one by another; for if Love has caus'd him to make Verses in the beginning of his life, I account it not impossible, but that, in case he lives to that age in which love is no longer in season, his inclination towards Verses may also induce him to write of Love; because Poetry and Love have such a sympathy, that they can seldom be divided one from the other. But I beseech you, do not imagine that Lucilius makes such Verses as favour a little of the condition of the Authors, which may perhaps be call'd Gentile Verses; because for the most part persons of that Quality are not skill'd enough in such things to make them well. More intelligent persons therein than my self, profess, that Lucilius composes Verses which might deserve Homer or Hesiod for their Author. For there is a good Fancie, Wit, Strength, and so charming a Harmony in them, that all the world is ravish'd with them. His descriptions are so handsome, so Poetical, and so Natural, that you would think you verily beheld all that he represents. If he paints the shadow of a Forest, he deludes the imagination; if he represents the Sea in a Tempest, the Rocks, and a Shipwrack, the hearts of the Readers tremble at what he describes. If he builds a stately Temple, you would think Apollo himself had been the Architect of it; and if he represents an unfortunate Lover, his unhappineses excite pity, and sighs from his relation; and because Sadness and Love together have a wonderful operation in Verse, he very rarely separates them; not but that when he is minded, his Muse is agreeably debonaire. One of the most curious Wits of his age having made a very ingenious and gallant Dialogue (after the example of Anacreon, who made one between a Dove and a Passenger) wherein he introduces a little Bird which returns every year in the Garden of one of his She-Friends, this work afterward occasion'd Lucilius and Theomenes to compose the most delightful Verses in the world, whose natural, pleasant, and sprightly Stile, argues that nothing is impossible to them. As for Love, Lucilius understands all the exquisiteness of it, and never was a Lover seen, whose sentiments have been more tender than his. He can love constantly, even without being lov'd; absence rather augments than diminishes Love in his Soul, and 'tis not easie for Infidelity itself to extinguish a passion in his breast. He loves with ardour and respect, he makes himself pleasures and torments which other Lovers would not think of, and he has sentiments so full of Love, that no other ever had the like. I have heard him say, that one day being at Sea, a terrible Tempest arose; which almost sunk the Ship he was in, in view of a Castle which stands upon a Rock, at the foot of which there was great likelihood it would be wrack'd, for the wind violently drive it on that side, and the Rudder was broken. In this condition, knowing that his Mistress was in that Castle, instead of abandoning his mind to fear like the rest, or so much as minding what course the Marriners took to preserve themselves from perishing, he lean'd against the foot of the Mast, and took pleasure in thinking that if he were Shipwrack'd in that place, the waves might carry his body to the foot of the Rock, where his Mistress going oftentimes to walk, might see it and bedew it with her tears; and this thought so wholly possess'd him, that he observ'd nothing at all that was done to resist the tempest. But through excess of love, he slighted the danger and death it self. But, in fine, 'tis enough to tell you that Lucilius can be as perfect a Lover as a Friend; for 'tis to tell you in few words that he is a perfectly worthy person, and deserves to be Brother to the generous Melintha. I agree with you (said Plotina) and if all men were like him, I think those Ladies were to be excus'd that suffer'd themselves to be lov'd by them. After this Lysimena rise up, and prepar'd to return to the Camp: but before she departed, all the company entreated her to continue to protect Aronces and Clelia, which she promis'd to do with great sincerity. After which she drew Berelisa apart, and speaking low to her, I have a while since so discover'd Clidamira to Artemidorus (said she to her) that you need not fear he will be unjust towards you. However I counsel you to hasten to make your voyage to Præneste, for 'tis possible that in that place the Gods will change the heart of Clidamira who alone at this time hinders our return to Leontium, though she makes shew of negotiating in behalf of the Prince my Brother and my self. Berelisa was desirous to know a little more precisely what Lysimena had told Artemidorus; but perceiving she haltred to depart, she was contented only to thank her for the agreeable intelligence she gave her; after which Lysimena return'd to the Camp, which was much moved at the imprisonment of Aronces, there being no person that could so much as suspect him of ever having had the thought to conspire against Porfenna. But what was very glorious for this Prince, as soon as the rumour was spread abroad in Rome, all the people remembering Aronces had been the cause of winning the Battle in which Brutus was slain, murmur'd highly against Porfenna, and without considering that the King had Hostages in his hands, or thinking of the consequences of this affair, they declar'd boldly, that it was fitting to break the Peace, and go and demand Aronces of the King of Hetruria. All the worthy persons of the Senate were as sensibly affected with the unhappiness of Aronces, and judging that they could do nothing more dangerous to this Prince than to testify their zeal towards him, they restrain'd the people as much as they could. But being they could not hinder them from speaking in pity of Aronces and complaint against Porfenna, Tullia, who had intelligence of these murmurings, made use of them to confirm her accusation of Aronces, by informing Porfenna that the Prince had more friends in Rome than in his Army. Whereupon Porfenna's mind being much incens'd against Aronces, he could not endure that any one should speak to him in his behalf. Which nevertheless Galerita and the Princess of the Leontines did not cease to do; the latter of which was not restrain'd by Zenocrates's jealousy from doing her utmost for Aronces, scarce any besides her self daring to urge Porfenna boldly in his favour. I beseech you, my Lord (said she to him at her return from Rome) suffer me to tell you that you do a very great wrong in accusing Aronces of a crime whereof no body suspects him capable, and you do no less in giving credit to all that Tullia says to you, who, you know, has neither virtue nor probity, who is subtle and cruel, and who hates Aronces and Clelia. I know all that you tell me (answer'd Porfenna) but it does not justify Aronces; and though Tullia be wicked, that does not hinder but that Aronces is an unnatural Son, and a Parricide, in whose heart love has extinguish'd all the sentiments of nature and virtue, and who looking upon me as an invincible obstacle to his imaginary felicity, has design'd to purchase it with my death. But, my Lord (reply'd Lysimena) how do you know Aronces has been author of such a design, and what proofs have been given of it? I have understood (answer'd Porfenna) that Aronces during his imprisonment in the Island of Saules, underwent that usage with very much impatience, though he always spoke with respect to those I sent to him; I have also been inform'd that he corrupted him, that guarded him, that he went secretly to Rome, and had some private conferences in a Garden with divers persons: I have further known that during the Siege he never lost any occasion to favour the Romans in things which were not absolutely against the order of War. I have been advertis'd too that having taken prisoners on the day the Bridge was assaulted, he remitted them, and writ something in his Tablets which he deliver'd to one that he releas'd; and lastly, I have spoken with two of those three hundred Conspirators.

Mutius told me of, who declare that they were several times employ'd to make the confederacy between Mutius and him, and that Aronces promis'd to secure him from perishing in the attempt. And indeed there must needs have been some secret intelligence between them, which I have not yet discover'd; for when Mutius had slain him whom he took for me, none offer'd to take him; and if I had not sent my guards for that end, Mutius had escaped. Besides, Aronces was in effect partly the cause that I pardon'd Mutius. But, my Lord (reply'd the Princess) if Aronces had been of that conspiracy, 'tis to be believ'd he would have better instructed Mutius, so that he should not have taken another for you. Did the Gods favour crimes (answer'd Porfenna) the criminals would never do any thing imprudently: but since they do not, they oftentimes in order to their punishment, permit those that would commit a wicked action to be blinded and deceiv'd in their judgments. So Mutius hapning to be mistaken by the purple Robe of the person he slew, because it was forgotten to tell him that this man's office allow'd him to wear one; it may be said, that he was deceiv'd happily for me, and unfortunately for Aronces. But, my Lord (reply'd the Princess of the Leontines) I do not yet see his crime well prov'd; for the two men who accuse him, may be suborn'd to do it. I would to the Gods, generous Princess (said he to her) that these people were false witnesses: but to speak the truth, all probabilities are against Aronces. For the obstinacy of Mutius not to name his complices, sufficiently argues that there was some one amongst them whom I might cause to be punish'd; if all the Conspirators had been Romans, there was no reason wherefore he should conceal their names from me. But, my Lord, (answer'd Lysimena) the most general opinion is, that Mutius told you a lye to induce you to the peace, and that he was the sole person concern'd in the design of assassinating you. I can believe (reply'd Porfenna) that there were not three hundred of them, but I shall never believe that Mutius was alone. 'Tis also added (contin'd he) that to perswade Mutius to this attempt, Aronces promis'd him to grant peace to Rome, after my death, without other conditions than that of putting Valeria and Clelia into his power, engaging to bring him to marry the first afterwards. But, my Lord (said Lysimena) if Aronces had been so wicked as to desire to take away your life, what need had he of Mutius, and why should he not rather have suborned one of your guards? That was not the safest course (answer'd Porfenna) for by that means he might perhaps have come to be suspected: but in the other way, taking away my life by the hand of a Roman, the action would seem to proceed out of zeal for the delivering of Rome, and would not at all reflect upon Aronces. But Love alone put them upon this crime; and to manifest to you that 'tis so (added he) I am newly inform'd that Mutius is fled. Judge then whether after this, I have reason to doubt of their testimony who accuse Aronces. And to the end you may doubt of it less, see this Letter from Clelia to Aronces, which was found in his Chamber, and must needs have been deliver'd him by one of his Guards. Lysimena taking it, knew the hand of Clelia, in which she had seen several Letters; and opening it, found these words.

Clelia to Aronces.

AS Criminal as you are, I do not cease to pity you; and notwithstanding your Crime, I shall still make more ardent Vows for your liberty, than I should do for my own.

This Letter no doubt seems to make against Aronces (said Lysimena) but, my Lord, two persons that love have so many little contests which embroil them together, that it ought not to be concluded from hence that Clelia knows Aronces is a criminal against you. On the contrary, it is to be thought, that if she did, she would not have written to him in these terms. You are a strange person, Madam (answer'd Porfenna roughly) to attribute judgment to persons prepossess'd with a great passion. However, all that I can do for Aronces (added he) is to defer his punishment; for I confess to you, I would willingly convict him by Mutius himself. Were it not that Hostages ought to be inviolable, I would use Clelia in such a manner that perhaps I might come to know many things by her, though I do not believe she was privy to the whole secret of the Conspiracy. On the contrary, I imagine that perhaps Aronces being unwilling to lose the merit of his Crime in her esteem, has only told her something of it since. In the mean time, I have two men who will maintain that he is culpable. But, as I told you, I will cause Mutius to be sought after, and oblige Publicola who affects him not, to force him to declare the truth. After which I will give as great an example of Justice, as Brutus did, when he beheld his own Sons put to death; for I will not be surpass'd by a Roman. Ah! my Lord (said Lysimena) you make me tremble with fear, to hear you speak in this manner. I beseech you, examine things well, remember that appearances are fallacious, and rather believe all that the great actions of Aronces, than that which the cruel Tullia tells you, who is accusom'd only to artifices and wickedness. For, do you think, my Lord (added she) that this Prince has any great tenderness for your life after you have granted peace to Rome? and ought you not rather to fear that she designs only to ingage you in a Crime? Be it how it will (answer'd Porfenna) that which she tells me, seems to me to be true; all conjectures are against Aronces, who cannot be happy so long as I live; and I will not be prevail'd with, either by your prayers or tears, the murmurs of all my own Subjects, or the complaints of the Romans (which moreover testify Aronces's intelligence with Rome) nor even the secret sentiments of Nature which I feel in my breast in spite of my self. But, my Lord (reply'd Lysimena) how comes it that those two men who accuse Aronces, inform you of a past danger, of an attempt that has fail'd, and are their own accusers? They could not have access to me (answer'd he) before the business was executed; afterwards they reveal'd it to the Prince of Messene, to inform me of it, which yet he did not, undoubtedly because he would not hurt Aronces. But for that they apprehend I knew nothing of the truth, they address'd themselves to Tullia, to whom I granted their pardon on condition they told me all they knew of the Conspiracy. But where are those men, my Lord? (said Lysimena) They are in a sure place (answer'd Porfenna) till I cause Aronces to be publicly condemn'd. You know (added he) I had a purpose to make a Marriage between you and him; but, Madam, you have too great a virtue, to have a Parricide given you for a husband, and the Gods, no doubt reserve you a better fortune. In the mean time speak no more to me of him, and forbid Galerita to intercede in his behalf; for the more he is pleaded for, the more I shall hasten his punishment.

After this Lysimena was constrain'd to be silent, to retire, and go to augment the sorrow of the Queen, by relating to her this discourse with Porfenna. Lysimena's sadness appearing manifestly in her countenance as she came away from the King of Herraria, all the Court was in fear for Aronces; and the rumor of it spreading abroad in all places, was augmented in the Camp.

Tullia being thus become necessary to Porfenna, not only because it was by her means that he could convict Aronces, against whom he was extremely incens'd, but also because his own Army being mutinous against him, he fear'd he should have need of Tarquins' Troops; Sextus went and came continually to the Quarter of Porfenna, whereby he extremely molested Clelia, who was incredibly sorrowful to see his passion for her increase in his heart. Not but that she avoided his sight as much as she could; but in the case things were in, she knew not where to find any protection. For the sentiments she had concerning the Princes of the Leontines would scarce suffer her to speak to her. But the greatest of her griefs was to understand Porfenna's sentiments concerning the Prince his Son, the correspondence of Tullia with that King, and the care that was taken to guard Aronces diligently. For this unfortunate Prince, as extremely belov'd as he was, could find no way to communicate his mind to Clelia, in answer to the Letter which he had receiv'd from her; for Telanus being become suspected, durst not come near one of his guards. Clelia had also another discontent, in not seeing her friends of Rome so often as formerly; for in this conjuncture, a tumult being both in the City and the Camp, the Consuls caus'd Horatius, Herminius, Emilius, Octavius, Spurius, and all the other Romans to forbear visiting the twenty fair Roman Ladies which were given in Hostage. Which was something difficult to make them consent to; but causing them to consider that if matters should fall cross, and they should be arrested, Clelia, Valeria, and all the rest would be in a worse condition than if they were at Rome, a sentiment of love induc'd them to resolve upon that which Policy could not. So that they were constrain'd to be contented with sending to know tidings of the persons which were dearest to them in the World. Themistus though prepar'd to go away with Merigenes, was nevertheless willing to stay some days. But as for Amilcar, out of particular privileges he went and came continually from the Camp to Rome, and from Rome to the Camp. Artemidorus being much better began to go abroad, and made his first visit to Berelisa, who was to depart the next day to go with Clidamira to Præneste, accompany'd by Anacreon, who would not leave them. This Prince being very civil, desir'd Berelisa's permission to see Clidamira at her chamber; besides, (added he) I have something to say to her, which is material for her to know. Ha! my Lord (answer'd Berelisa) will you never leave this exact civility towards a person, who has so unfaithful a heart? and can you still esteem her so much as to conceal from me her last weakness? Artemidorus blushes hereupon; for he did not imagine the Princess of the Leontines had told Berelisa any thing of that which she had inform'd him of. No, no, my Lord (added she) your silence is not at all obliging; for when men wholly cease to love an unfaithful person, they are willing to publish their infidelity. But no doubt because you cannot altogether quit your love to Clidamira, you are ashamed to let me know that she can never cease to deceive you. I must have confided in her words (reply'd Artemidorus) to be obnoxious to be deceiv'd by her. Wherefore then (said Berelisa) do you not tell me that she has a new correspondence with Meleontus? Because, being your sister-in-law (answer'd he) I respect you in her person; besides, as I have told you a hundred times, I conceive 'tis a piece of honorable prudence for a man not to publish the weaknesses of a person whom he has lov'd, and who would still persuade him, that she does not hate him. But in the bottom of my heart, I protest to you, I slight her as much as I esteem you; I behold all her charms without having my heart affected with them; I look upon the testimonies of her affection as signs of weakness, or dissimulation; and I never lov'd you so much as I do at this present. Go therefore, Madam, confidently to Præneste; for since the Gods are veracious, you can learn nothing there which will not be to your advantage. If you would have me believe you (reply'd Berelisa) tell me what you know concerning Clidamira. I know, Madam (answer'd he) that there is a great league between her and Meleontus, and that consequently neither the Princess my Sister nor my self are likely to be ever recall'd from our Banishment. 'Tis true, Clidamira being crafty, would persuade me that she deludes Meleontus, and entertains correspondence with him, only to do us service. Nevertheless, I know what I ought to think of it; but prudence requires us to dissemble as well as she; for she has a great influence upon the mind of Meleontus; Meleontus is Master of that of the Prince; and Meleontus too, as you know, hates Lysimena, because he has lov'd her too much. Believe me (reply'd Berelisa) one cannot satisfy so many duties at once; and excessive prudence is not always compatible with excessive Love; to be a good Citizen, a great observer of the Laws, never to fail in any duty to Relations, Friends, Superiors, and fair comportment, is to have too many things to do; and in such cases, 'tis frequent to fail towards a Mistress. Nevertheless, according to the Laws of Love, a man ought to be capable of failing in every thing rather than in that. But you do not consider, Madam, (said Artemidorus) that your interest is join'd with mine in this case. I know what you say (answer'd Berelisa) but I confess I know as well too, that when a man does not hate that which he once lov'd, he loves it still. On the contrary (reply'd the Prince) hatred is many times but a disguis'd Friendship, and indifference is a true proof of an extinguish'd affection. I confess (answer'd Berelisa) that a clear indifference is a sign there is no more Love; but when this indifference is accompanied with an exact civility, believe me, my Lord, believe me, if he that is capable of it loves no longer, 'tis possible at least that he may love again. But, in brief, without shewing you further my weakness in not being able to conceal the discontent

you cause me, I will go to Præneste, to learn what shall be told me concerning your sentiments, which your self do not know so well as to inform me of them. Ah! cruel person, that you are (cry'd he) why do you speak to me in this manner? Think you, I have forgot all that I promis'd you? think you, I can compare Clidamira to Berelisa? and do you believe I have not observ'd the difference between her sentiments and yours during my sickness? Clidamira so well knows how to counterfeit (answer'd Berelisa) that perhaps you believe she was as sad as I, to see your life in danger. No, no, (reply'd Artemidorus) I am not mistaken in Clidamira; I have seen her put on an affected negligence, to seem more sorrowful; which yet did not move me: I have seen her compose her eyes, summon up tears, and make sighs, which proceeded more from her will than her heart; in brief, I have always seen her decently attird in her negligence, and in the greatest extremity of my sickness; nor did I ever see her relinquish the care of her beauty a moment, even then when she believ'd I was not far from death. Ha! my Lord (interrupted Berelisa) you would not have seen or observ'd any thing of all this. You are very unjust (answer'd Artemidorus) to turn to poison all that I speak to cure you. For at the same time I observ'd all that I have told you, I saw a real sorrow painted in your countenance, I beheld true tears fall from your fair eyes, I heard you sigh with tenderness, I mark'd the carelessness of your attire, sufficiently to be persuaded that you did not remember that then you were fair; and if I dare speak it, I saw your heart affected enough, to believe that perhaps my death would have caus'd yours. And will you quarrel with me after this, Madam? and not permit me to dissemble a little with Clidamira for your interest? I know not what to answer you (said she) but I know well, I cannot endure that Clidamira should hope to be lov'd by you, and 'tis only to deprive her of that hope that I go to Præneste. For when I consider well upon it, I cannot believe you should make an ill choice between an unfaithful person and Berelisa. After this Artemidorus spoke so many obliging things to Berelisa, that she consented he should go bid Clidamira adieu, on condition that she should come into her chamber a moment after him. And accordingly the Prince was no sooner enter'd into it, but Berelisa was conducted thither by Amilcar, who came to take leave of these two fair persons which were to depart the next day. Anacreon and Cesonia enter'd presently after, so that Berelisa had the satisfaction to see that Clidamira could not bid Adieu to Artemidorus in private. Whereby her mind being more at liberty, her conversation became more agreeable. That which gave occasion to render it such, was this; Clidamira had had a Dream which disquieted her, and being so weak as to believe that Dreams are always of a good or bad presage, she complain'd to Cesonia of having slept ill. Alas! (said she) if you knew what a Dream I had, you would not wonder at it. How! (cry'd Amilcar) is it possible a bad Dream should cause Clidamira to have an unquiet night? What? (said she in some astonishment) does not Amilcar, who has so much wit and is so learned, know that some Dreams are certain predictions? I know (answer'd he) all that can be known concerning Dreams, and if I should make you the History of them, you would see that I am not ignorant therein. I know that Homer says, Dreams, and particularly those of Kings are sent from Hea-

Heaven, that many excellent Philosophers have believ'd, the Gods distribute them to men, and that Pythagoras, who made them a great Mystery, learnt the Art of interpreting them, especially amongst the Egyptians and Chaldeans. I know that there are Temples Built on purpose to receive the inspirations of Dreams, that in Egypt people go to sleep in the Temple of Serapis, to the end to have Prophetical Dreams, and that great care is taken there to record all Dreams which a fortuitous event has verifi'd. Moreover, I know what a Dream Mandana had, which presag'd the power of Cyprus; but being an African, and not oblig'd to believe that which people believe in Egypt or Persia, any more than what Pythagoras believ'd, I declare to you, that I laugh at all the Dreams in the World. For my part (said Anacreon, feigning himself of Clidamira's opinion) I assure you I am not of your mind, for this last night I had a Dream, the consequence of which will occasion me much trouble. Oh! I beseech you (said Clidamira) tell me what you Dreamt of. He thought (answer'd he with a serious countenance) about midnight, Cupid, who never sleeps, came to knock at my chamber door. I askt him who knockt, and he answer'd me, 'twas a poor child all wet with a storm, that desir'd shelter of me. Being I thought his voice very sweet, I pity'd him, and open'd the door to him; when by the light of my Lamp which was still burning, I beheld that this lovely child had two wings, a quiver upon his shoulder, and a bow in his hand. Then I wip'd his hair, caus'd him to come near the fire, and dry'd him with very much goodness; after which this little Traytor took his Bow, saying, he would see whether the rain had not spoil'd it. But, alas! he no sooner took it in hand, but he bent it, and shot an arrow straight into my heart. After which he laugh'd at me and flew away, only telling me that his Bow was as it should be. Whereupon I was so enrag'd for having been deceiv'd, that remembering confus'dly, that people cry, Stop thief when any one is rob'd, I began to cry, Stop Cupid, stop Cupid, so loud, that I wak'd. But the mischief (said Anacreon) that at the first visit I made this day, this dream was turn'd into a History, by the charms of a person infinitely amiable. This is so jolly a dream (answer'd Berelisa smiling) that I condemn you to make an Ode upon it. If it were made long ago (said Amilcar) Clidamira would be much deluded; for she has heard this dream with as much attention as if Anacreon had had it indeed. But I am confident he has said all this only to intimate to Clidamira that he is taken with her to day more than ordinary. Since you have so well expounded my real sentiments (answer'd Anacreon) I will acknowledge what you have said. How? (cry'd Clidamira much disturb'd) did not you dream as you have related, and are you of Amilcar's opinion that no heed is to be given to dreams? No question, I am Madam, (said Anacreon.) For my part (said Artemidorus) who scarce ever dream at all, I never cared much to reason upon dreams. As for me (said Berelisa) I have always found them so frivolous, false, extravagant and chimerical, that I shall easily rank my self on Amilcar's side. And for my particular (said Cesonia) I confess, it has hapned to me to dream of things which have befallen me so exactly, that I know not what to think of them. Since chance (answer'd Amilcar) sometimes represents very regular Pictures in the Clouds, it is not to be wonder'd, if hazard brings to pass some things which are dream'd of.

I have heard a Thuscan woman affirm that the most ancient manner of Divination was by dreams. She also told me that those which we have presently after repast, or in the second sleep, signifie nothing, but that those we have in the beginning of the morning, are the most certain; that the dreams of the Spring are more true, than those of the Autumn; and that it's more ordinary to dream in the new Season of the Year than in all the rest. Believe me (amiable Cesonia) said Artemidorus, dreams are only a bare representation of images. They are pleasant or sad, according to the constitution when they are purely natural. Those which are mixt, have extrinsecal causes, which supply matter to the fanisie; and this is the reason that many times we dream of things which we have seen, or thought on, and most of all of things which we desire. And certainly this last manner of dreaming has brought Dreams into such credit, when it falls out that we see the people by day whom we dream of by night. For many times our hearts desire or fear many things, which we are not sensible of; so that in sleeping, our fanisie, which is mov'd by our desires and fears, without our consent, causes us to dream more of that which we fear or desire than of any other thing. It is not therefore to be wonder'd if it sometimes comes to pass by chance, that we see those we dreamt of, because we usually dream of those people whom we cannot meet with. Since 'tis certain that we desire only that which may be hop'd, and fear only that which may possibly come to pass, I agree with you (said Amilcar) that Dreams may denote our inclinations, but I deny that they can preface our fortunes, unless as they proceed from our constitutions. For, they say, cruel people are wont to have terrible dreams as well as those that are melancholick. So that when it falls out that the dreams and adventures of these people have resemblance, it is not to be wonder'd at, so far as they are produc'd by one and the same cause. I know well such as are skilful in dreams, say there are three sorts, which they distinguish and divide as exactly, as if they had travell'd into the Country of Dreams, as men do into Asia. But to speak truth, they are mistaken; for if the Gods would advertise men of that which must betide them, they would do it more clearly. And besides (added he) when I see a Grey-hound asleep dream of a Deer, as I do of my mistress, and perhaps better too, I conclude that my dreams come from my temper alone, I set my mind at rest, and do every thing as if I had not dreamt at all. Indeed (added Berelisa.) I know no more pleasant fanisie than to think that the Gods await till we be asleep to advertise us so doubtfully of that which must happen to us; the Gods, I say, who are Lords of the World and of Events, who can change our wills as they please, and who inspire to us all that seems good to them. But, I beseech you (said Anacreon) what kind of dream is that which the fair Clidamira had? It is such (answer'd she blushing) that I cannot tell it to any but Artemidorus. This Prince then became sufficiently perplex'd; for he conceiv'd this was but a contrivance of Clidamira to speak to him apart before he went away. But though he much fear'd to offend Berelisa, yet he could not resolve to answer Clidamira uncivilly before persons that were strangers. Wherefore, beginning to speak, I am so little skilful in interpreting dreams (said he coldly,) that I see not why you should choose me rather than another. However, my Lord (answer'd she) I must needs tell tell it you; and so approaching near, and speaking low to him; Do not fear (said she to him) that I am going to entertain you with my dreams; and if you have any justice left, consider (I conjure you) whilst Berelisa and I go to Praneste, that your heart was mine before hers was yours, and that I ought not to be so generous as to procure your return to Leontium, with the certainty of never being lov'd by you. 'Tis too much, Madam, 'tis too much (answer'd he, not being able to restrain himself) to desire to be lov'd at the same time both by Meleontus and Artemidorus. How? my Lord (said she) do you not understand that I endeavour'd to make Meleontus who is the Prince's Favourite, my Lover, only that I might be in a capacity to make your peace when I pleas'd? I understand very well (answer'd he) that Clidamira is ever desirous to gain all and lose nothing. But as far as I perceive, my Lord (said Berelisa blushing) you have dream'd as well as Clidamira, for you speak at least as much to her as she does to you. You have very well guess'd (answer'd Clidamira, who delighted to make Berelisa jealous) but Artemidorus's dream is not so assuredly true as mine. Perhaps if he expounded yours (reply'd she hastily) it would not be granted to be more true than his. Believe me (said Amilcar to Clidamira) stay till you be at Praneste for the explication of your dreams; for you will find there a Kinsman of the Priest of Fortunes Temple, who has so great a wit, that what he is ignorant of, is not known by any. But since you conceive (answer'd Clidamira) no heed is to be given to Dreams, you must think too that no explication can be given of them. I do so, (reply'd Amilcar) but I am strongly perswaded, he I speak of will convince you that none but Physicians can make good use of the dreams of their Patients, whereby they sometimes judge very certainly what humor it is that is predominant in them. I beseech you (said Berelisa, who sought only to interrupt the conversation of Artemidorus with her Rival) give us recommendations to him you speak of. I will, Madam (answer'd Amilcar) but before I write to him (for I contracted a friendship with him during my travels) I have a desire to tell you what manner of person he is, that so if he does not please you, I may not lose a Letter. You are a good husband of your words (reply'd Berelisa) but however I consent to what you desire. And so do I (added Artemidorus) and for my part (said Cesonia) I entreat it of you; For I have heard a good character given of him by a Kinswoman of mine who was at Praneste. As for me (said Anacreon) I shall be glad to know what kind of person an honest man is whom I am to see. There remains only Clidamira to entreat me (said Amilcar.) Since I do not oppose the consent of the company (answer'd she) 'tis sufficient. Know then (said Amilcar) that Telantus is of a middle stature, has black hair, a pale complexion, very large eyes, a handsome mouth, an ingenious aspect, a sweet and careless air; he naturally loves the world and pleasures, but having a quick-sighted mind, he has by his prudence plac'd himself out of the reach of many accidents which might have render'd him unhappy. His wit is a little slow; but yet he speaks very agreeably, though he has no very sprightly fancy. If he followed his own inclination, he would be full of discourse; but he contrains himself partly out of wisdom and partly out of policy. Most commonly he does not speak his thoughts of what he sees, but when he pleases he speaks them admirably well. Yet he is subject to be prejudic'd; and without thinking himself to be so, he many times does injustice even when he believes himself most equitable; but this defect is not peculiar to him, and the greatest part of men are guilty of it. Indeed I saw him once have a very strange prejudice upon a certain occasion; for because he did not affect an ancient Priest of the Temple of Fortune, he judg'd that he did not speak well when he spoke in publick. And yet it is certain, that venerable old man charms all that hear him. He speaks with vehemence and elegance, his language is neither coarse nor affected, he knows how to joyn the Graces of Eloquence with the solidity of Morality; and if he is not always assur'd to persuade those that hear him, yet he is so to be heard with pleasure, even by such as are incapable to profit by his instructions. For all this, Telantus does not account him eloquent. Believe me (answer'd Berelisa) he is not the sole person that is liable to be prejudic'd, and 'tis more hard than we think, not to be so at all. When one is but a little (reply'd Amilcar) 'tis no great defect; but when so much as to account that evil which is good, and ugly which is handsome, 'tis a great imperfection in an elevated mind; for there is a great distinction to be made between an error proceeding from ignorance, and an error proceeding from prejudice. But to return to Telantus, I believe he has something in his heart that inclines him to be very amorous, and ambitious, and I am perswaded he has had great conflicts with himself to overcome these two sentiments. No doubt he has done well (said Berelisa) for they are many times the causes of great disquiet. That's certain (answer'd Berelisa) but withal they cause a thousand pleasures. Believe me (said Clidamira) neither all the ambitious nor all the prejudic'd are known, but sometimes we see people that make shew of not being so, who affect to despise ambition, to satisfy that which they have in their hearts. However it be (said Amilcar) I think men are not frequently deceiv'd who believe themselves always liable to error; and the surest way is to judge affirmatively of nothing upon appearances. But to return again to Telantus, he is complacent and civil, he loves company, and particularly that of Ladies, and I can assure you, that if he pleases he will write you pleasant Letters, as much Priest as he is; for I conceive this faculty is never lost after 'tis once gotten. I have further to tell you that Telantus believes as well as I, that 'tis no easie matter to find a great contentment without the assistance of Fortune. Thus, fair Berelisa, you see what a person the illustrious Telantus is; it remains for you to tell me whether you would have me write to him. You will do me a very great pleasure in so doing (answer'd she.) For my part (said Clidamira) I shall be glad to see him, but according to the character you give of him, I think I shall not speak to him about my dreams. After this, Artemidorus went away; but though Berelisa knew he would give Clidamira no new opportunity to speak to him, yet she was not fully satisfi'd with him, because she was solicitous to have him give her an account of what Clidamira said when she spoke to him apart. So that she look'd a little coldly upon him as he went out; which though his heart reproacht him with nothing, gave him some discontent; and therefore he writ to her the next morning. But he that carri'd the Letter being stop't by the way, Berelisa was gone her journey towards Praneste with Clidamira and Anacreon, Artemidorus not being yet in a condition to travel. Nevertheless, less, to repair the fault of him that he sent, he caus'd a slave of notable wit to depart immediately to Præneste and carry Berellisa her first Letter accompany'd with another.

In the mean time Amilcar continu'd to seek out ways to serve Aronces, and so did Herminius, and all the virtuous gallants of Rome, excepting Horatius, who, how generous soever, could not be sorry for the unhappiness of his Rival. As for Zenocrates, his secret jealousy caus'd him to avoid speaking of Aronces as much as he could, for fear it should be observ'd that he was less his friend than formerly. But though Amilcar would not altogether renounce his jollity, yet there were some hours, wherein he was pensive at least, if not sad. For besides the Imprisonment of Aronces, and the trouble in which Plotina was, his mind was extremely perplex'd by an order brought him by an African lately arriv'd, to return to Carthage. He lov'd Plotina as much as it is possible to love, he had Friends at Rome very dear to him, and he had an especial Friend in his own Country, who at that time had great need of him. Thus duty towards his Master, affection to his Friend, the interest of Aronces and the love he had for Plotina sufficiently divided his heart, to cause those that knew him well, to observe some little alteration in his humour. Plotina soon perceiv'd it; and at first thought his resentment of Aronces's danger was the only cause of his discontent; and loving Clelia very well, he was sensibly concern'd in her sorrow: as indeed Amilcar was extremely affected with the unhappinesses of Aronces and Clelia. But as love makes an exact discovery of the sentiments of the person lov'd, Plotina at length knew Amilcar's disturbance proceeded from some cause of his own. At which being troubled, Whence comes it, Amilcar (said she to him) that I see something in your countenance which seems to tell me you are sad? Alas! amiable Plotina (answer'd he) I see I can hide nothing from you, for I intended to dissemble the discontent which I have in my breast. But since you have discover'd it, I must let you know, that love does not torment me only in Italy, it persecutes me also in Africa in the person of an illustrious Friend who is become unhappy by it. I knew all the beginning of his love, and was something concern'd in it: but since I departed out of Africa, some things have befallen him, which excite me to pity him, and afflict me so much the more, for that I believe my presence is absolutely necessary to redress the fortune of my Friend. Nevertheless, the affection I have for you is so strong, that I know not whether the command of a Master, and the misfortunes of a Friend will be sufficient to oblige me to make a voyage into Africa. I say, a Voyage, Madam (add'd he) because at this present I account Rome my Country; for a Lover has no other but that of his Mistress. That which you say, is very obliging (reply'd Plotina) but being I am equitable and generous, I will not cause you to be deficient either to your Prince, or to your Friend. All that I desire of you is, that you will not depart till we be return'd to Rome, and Aronces be acquitted. We hope this will shortly be effected; for the Queen of Hettrina, the Princess of the Leontines, the generous Melinthia, and the amiable Hersilia have signifi'd to my sister and me this morning, that they were going this day to make their utmost instance with Porfenna: I promise you more than you desire; Madam (said he to her) for I engage not to depart at all unless you command me. As he was speaking thus, Valeria enter'd, and told them Lucilius had sent word that all the Friends of Aronces were gone to intercede so urgently with Porfenna in his behalf, that a happy success was to be expected thereby. Which news something satisfying the minds of these two amiable Virgins, Plotina told Valeria what Amilcar had said to her, and then intreated him to declare what unhappiness it was that had befallen his friend he spoke of. Since the misfortunes of others sometimes a little solace our own (said he) I will content your curiosity, and no doubt you will agree that my Friend is to be pity'd, that love is the same in all places, and that there is no infelicity so great, but that another may be found like it. After this, Valeria and Plotina knowing that Clelia was with Hermilia, gave order that none should interrupt them: and then Amilcar began to speak in these terms.

The History of Cloranisbes and Lysonice.

YOU have heard me speak so much of Carthage; and you are so well inform'd of all that relates to my Country, of which the persons are, whom I am to speak of, that I shall in a manner wholly forbear to speak any thing of the Original of Utica, its manners, magnificence, customs or gallantry, being the same with those of Carthage; for I presuppose that as I, being an African, am become a Roman for your sakes, so you being Romans are become half Africans for mine. I shall therefore only tell you, that Cloranisbes, whose adventures I am to relate, is of a very illustrious Lineage, and that he is one of the most worthy, courageous, accomplish'd and agreeable persons in the world. He has a very noble air, a lofty countenance, and in brief, wants nothing that can get a man esteem, merit love or friendship. He has neglected no means to accomplish himself; for he has travell'd, and has been in Greece to learn all that could not be taught him in Africa. Nor has he done like some young persons, who seem in the beginning of their lives to design to acquire extraordinary worth, but after they have learnt many things which are suitable for the world, they become idle and never practise any thing which they learnt. For my part I account those, that have attain'd some good qualities, and afterwards are in a long uncertainty what they ought to do, to be as void of Reason as a Pilot, who should furnish a Ship with all things necessary for a long Voyage, weigh Anchor, hoise Sayl, and then not knowing whither he would go, abandon himself to the pleasure of the Wind, and put himself in danger of being swallow'd up by a quick-sand, or split against a Rock. Yet the World abounds with such people, as have learnt the Art Military, and were never afterwards at the War; with others, who have had Dancing-Masters, and never go to Balls, and which is worst, with others who have learnt to speak several languages, and speak their own ill; and with others too, who are born in the world, and do not understand it. I crave your pardon for my comparison and my observations, but I could not refrain them; hereafter I will be more cautious of digressing so far from Cloranisbes. Know then, that having learnt all things requisite to the accomplishing of a brave man, he determin'd to pass his life at the Court, and to do all he could to obtain honour there.

Accord-

Accordingly in the beginning of his manhood, a War being fallen out between Numidia and Massilia, he signaliz'd himself in it, and perform'd actions worthy of great applause. So that the Prince of Carthage was pleas'd to take him into favour, and to reside about him. I need not put you in mind (amiable Plotina, and charming Valeria) that this Prince is call'd so, only by reason he is descended from an Aunt of Dido, and that ordinarily he dwells at Utica; because I suppose you remember to have heard that 'tis only a Title which he wears, though he has no authority in Carthage. Nevertheless, he has great interest there, but he is a Sovereign only in his own State. So that he is really but Prince of Utica, though he is stil'd otherwise. This City is of a very strong situation, upon the shore of the Sea, and near a great River, thirty miles from Carthage. Its Original is very dubious, it has been ruin'd and rebuilt, it has chang'd its name two sundry times, and it may be said, that 'tis one of the most inconstant Cities of the World in all things. 'Tis true, the air of the Country is apt to inspire levity, and therefore the changes are less to be wonder'd which happen in these places than in others. The Numidians and Massilians who are neighbours, are levity it self; and 'tis not altogether without Reason that people rely not too much upon the faith of the Africans. Not but that honesty is of every Countrey, and constancy is sometimes to be met with at Utica as well as at Rome. Yea, there is a Prophecie which affirms, that in this City shall one day be seen the greatest example of constancy that ever was heard of, and that it shall be accounted a modern City, although it be very ancient. But since I know not what is to come I cannot assure you, whether this Prediction be true or false, but only that the Court of the Prince of Utica is very agreeable. For all the brave persons of Carthage go thither frequently to visit the Prince and most of the youth of Quality of Numidia come to learn gallantry under the Prince of Carthage. The Ladies there have noble aspects and delightful wits; and though there are few great Beauties amongst them, yet there are abundance infinitely amiable, and indeed scarce any unhandsome. They are all pleasing, merry, and gentle; but how lovely soever they were, Cloraniſbes at his return from his Travels did not become amorous. His mind was so fill'd with the Greek beauties that had charm'd him, and the gallantry of *Athen*s and Corinth so strongly possess'd him, that he had nothing but ambition in his heart when he arriv'd at Utica. So that the desire to please the Prince was the great spur to make him active. The Prince of Carthage had at that time a Sister much elder than himself, who taking a fancy to rule him absolutely, had a strange jealousy of every one that came near him. Wherefore the merit of Cloraniſbes causing her to be jealous of him, she secretly did him all the bad offices she could; though she deport'd herself civilly enough towards him before the Prince and the whole Court. But he was so amiable a person, and the Prince had such a great inclination to love him, that her artifices were at first unprofitable. When she saw she could do him no hurt, she bethought her self to remove him from the Court by some honourable way. And accordingly, as young as he was, she caus'd the Prince to send him to negotiate affairs of importance in Libya; at his return, a War hapning between Carthage and Numidia, he was made a Commander of the Forces which the Prince sent thither; but taking advantage of his absence, she caus'd a hundred things to be told the Prince, to render his fidelity suspected to him. She also corrupted some Friends and ancient Domesticks of Cloraniſbes; after which, she caus'd some of her own dependants to suggest several things to the Prince against Cloraniſbes, which should induce him to believe that he was a man of boundless ambition, that he held intelligence with the King of Numidia, that he betray'd Carthage and him too, and that it was very dangerous to suffer him longer in the head of the Army. Whereas nothing of importance was wont to be told the Prince, but he communicated it to the Princess his sister, in whom he absolutely confided, she made shew not to believe the informations given against Cloraniſbes, and offer'd to justify him. But in fine (said she to him with unparallel'd dissimulation) though I am perswaded Cloraniſbes is innocent, yet 'tis requisite to act with as much prudence, as if he were believ'd culpable; and therefore, my Lord, if I may counsel you, send a strict order to Cloraniſbes to come immediately to you. If he comes, it will be fit to observe him and endeavour to discover the truth: if he does not, his disobedience will argue his guilt. The Prince judging this advice of the Princess reasonable, sent an express order to Cloraniſbes to come forthwith to him, and to resign the command of the Forces to another whom the Prince nam'd to him. But at the same time that this order was dispatcht away, this subtle Princess oblig'd those false Friends of Cloraniſbes whom she had suborn'd and treacherous Domesticks to write to him to beware of coming. So that when Cloraniſbes receiv'd the Prince's order, he received four tickets, which extremely perplex'd him; for, in the first he found only these words,

Very bad offices have been done you here; have a care, and distrust all things.

In another,

The Prince is much incens'd against you; the Princess excuses you as much as she is able, but cannot appease him; take care of your affairs and your safety.

There was also a third, in which Cloraniſbes found these words:

Your destruction is design'd, Cloraniſbes, therefore do not trust to your innocence; for they which have power to ruin the innocent, make them criminal when they please.

But that which astonish'd Cloraniſbes most was the fourth, which spoke thus:

If you obey the Prince's Order, you cannot escape imprisonment or death; this is all that can be told you by a Friend who hazards his own fortune to save you.

You may judge, Madam, in what a perplexity Cloraniſbes was; for he did not mistrust those who gave him this advice. But that which wholly perswaded him to think himself lost was, that the Princess of Carthage having cunningly caus'd a rumor to be spread in Utica, that if Cloraniſbes came, he should be arrested, he receiv'd also twenty other advices, and particularly one from so faithful a Friend, that he could not doubt of it. Yet his own inclination led him to trust to his innocence, and to go to the Prince. But having consulted two very prudent friends whom he had in the Army, they dissuaded him from it. But if I do not obey (said Cloraniſbes) I render my self suspected, and become culpable. Believe me (answer'd one of those that counsel'd him)

'tis better for a man to render himself suspected than miserable: but to take a middle course in this extremity, and to testify that you design not to render your self Master of the Forces, leave the Army and go towards Utica; and whereas you have a house upon the frontier, feign your self sick, write to the Prince, that as soon as you recover you will go to him, and in the mean time your friends will do their utmost to discover what you are accus'd of, and justify you to the Prince. This counsel seeming very prudent to Cloraniſbes, he oppos'd his own inclination, and follow'd the advice of his friends. So he left the Army, made shew of intending to go Utica, feign'd himself sick, when he was at his house upon the frontier, and writ to the Prince after the manner that he was counsell'd. But at the same time he answer'd all those that had given him intelligence, and conjur'd them to send him what they could learn. Wherefore they that betray'd him shewing his Letters to the Prince, who endeavour'd to destroy him, she made use of them to persuade the Prince that he was not really sick, and to inform him what a curiosity he had to know all that was spoken of him at Utica. For though he spoke in his Letters as being innocent, yet they contributed something to make him seem culpable, because they imply'd that he was not very sick, that he was desirous of intelligence, and durst not trust himself. But to make the matter worse, this subtle Princess pretending to be his Friend, sent one of her own Physicians to him, to the end that if he were in health as she believ'd, he might inform the Prince of it; and that if he were sick, she might make him report that he was not. Now, for that a Fever is not to be had at pleasure, Cloraniſbes took his bed indeed, and carried himself like a sick man; but the Physician found that he was in health, and reported so to the Prince, who no longer doubting but that Cloraniſbes was guilty, was so exasperated against him, that all the intercessions of his true friends could not hinder the Prince from sending to forbid him coming near to Utica; for the house where Cloraniſbes stay'd, was upon the frontier. So that Cloraniſbes was banish'd without knowing the cause of this severity against him. At first he was extremely afflicted; but having a great and firm Soul, he took a resolution on a sudden, and writ to his Friends to desire them not to trouble themselves further about making his peace, assuring them that he found his heart strong enough to be able to live in solitude, and enjoy himself without being concern'd with the rest of the world. 'Tis true, there was a wise old man who contributed much to cause him to take this resolution; for going to see one of his friends a days journey from his own house, he lost his way, and went cross the corner of a Forest. And finding a mountainous and barren Countrey beyond, he perceiv'd some miserable Shepherds tilling a little corner of ground between the Rocks, and observ'd a venerable old man who liv'd in a Cave not far off, and who with a countenance both melancholy and serene, said to them, as he beheld them, Alas! poor people! beware of rendering your fields fruitful; leave your land uncultivated, if you love quiet; for if your Countrey become good, you will soon have

War. Cloraniſbes who stopt to ask the way, having heard what this venerable old man said, seem'd surpris'd at it, and turning towards him, Tell me I pray (said he) for what reason you would make a desert of the Countrey you dwell in. Because (answer'd he) solitude is always inseparable from deserts, barrenness upholds solitude; virtue and peace are in solitude preserv'd, and felicity found; if it be possible for men to be capable of it. This old man who was a Greek; though he spoke the African tongue, and whose name was Andronodorus, spoke this with so grave an air, that Cloraniſbes believ'd that perhaps the Gods had caus'd him to meet with him for his comfort. Wherefore lighting from his horse, and giving him to the slave which follow'd him, he drew Andronodorus apart, and askt him, who he was? where he liv'd? what had caus'd the aversion, which he had against the World? My Lord (said he to him) I was born at Samos, and I was banish'd by Polycrates when he usurp'd the Sovereign Power, because he knew well I could not submit. So I departed from my Countrey with all that I could carry in a Ship, intending to see if it were possible for the monsters of Africa to be more inhumane than the men of my Countrey. For in truth, my Lord, I acknowledge to the shame of mankind, I never found any thing but weakness, folly, injustice, and wickedness in all places where I have liv'd, and principally in those where wealth and plenty are to be met with. I have had a father who took no thought for any thing but his pleasures, I have had children who would have me mind nothing but theirs; my wife had virtue, but not goodness; my relations had no humanity, my friends were but little sincere to my interests, my domesticks were of small fidelity; and in sum, I may say, that in all places where I have liv'd, I have seen almost all others as unhappy as my self, though they did not think so. But fortune having caus'd me to suffer shipwreck upon the Coast of Africa long ago, and chance conducted me to a Cave on the side of this Forest which you have cross'd, I took it for my habitation, and have liv'd here since by the assistance of a slave, who escap'd drowning with me, and with the help of some poor Fishers has till'd as much Land as is necessary for our subsistence. So that this little Sanctuary being encompass'd with a very great extent of Land which is not husbanded, I have enjoy'd much tranquillity since I came hither, without conversing with any but the Priest of a Temple not far from hence, who taught me his language. But I see these poor people at work, will make my Desert arable; and so I look upon them as those that go about to destroy my felicity; for, in brief, if they bring me neighbours, they will bring me enemies.

Cloraniſbes then admiring Andronodorus, desir'd him that he would lead him to his Cave; which at first he refus'd: but on a sudden checking himself, Come, my Lord (said he to him) come, for it is not fit for me to belye my self, and after having affirm'd that virtue may be preserv'd in solitude, to shew you only a wild and uncivil virtue. After this Andronodorus led Cloraniſbes by a small path little trodden; before his Cave he found a little rustical Garden, but very neat, and in the Cave a Bed of Bulrushes woven together, Seats of the same, some Books which he had borrow'd of the Priest, and Writing-Tables. Then Andronodorus took his turn to ask Cloranisbes, who he was? and this illustrious exile related his fortune to him, Upon which Andronodorus, who wish'd he could make Hermits of all the men in the World, set himself to persuade him so earnestly not to offer to resist the will of the Gods, that he fell to tell him a hundred things, whereof I cannot refrain from telling you part. I beseech you (said he to Cloranisbes) suffer not your self to run into that general error of all men, who will always force their destiny. Resign your self to the conduct of the Gods, and know that true Wisdom consists only in this. As long as I was in my own Countrey, I behav'd my self like a good Patriot; but since Fortune cast me into a strange one, without subsistence and without any sanctuary, I made my self one, and have found a safer in poverty and solitude, than I could have done elsewhere. For since I came hither, I have deceiv'd no person, and none has deceiv'd me. The error of all men, is blindly to seek that which they have not; they who have no tranquillity, desire it, but do not that which is requisite to obtain it; and they who have, are weary of it, and think they should be happier in a more turbulent way of life. When we are children, we long to be a little advanced in age; when we are very old, we wish we could again become Children, and when we are in the prime age of our lives, we never consider what we have been, nor what we must be, nor many times too, what we are; but only addict our selves to find out pleasures, which are so momentary, that we scarce know whether they are pleasures or no, because ordinarily sorrow follows them so close, that it extinguishes all their sweetness. Thus, Cloranisbes, you see what the World is, which you have so much regret to be banish'd from. But, wise Andronodorus (answer'd he) as I am far from your age, so I am from your wisdom; and therefore I should find it a hard matter not to strive all I could against my bad fortune. But, who told you that it is bad? (said Andronodorus) do you know the secrets of destiny? and is it not your duty to conform your self to it? We have sometimes seen people think that they were out of their way, who in the mean time escap'd being overwhelm'd under the ruins of a house which had fallen upon them if they had follow'd the ordinary way. Therefore 'tis the grand secret, as I told you, to submit to the decree of Heaven, and to have so noble a soul, and so rational a mind, as to be always ready to pass from good to bad fortune, from riches to poverty, from health to sickness, from liberty to servitude, and from life to death. This certainly is that which Pythagoras intended to signify by his Metempsychosis or transmigration of souls; for no doubt he only meant to intimate, that the soul of man could not be all things. 'Tis fit then not to resist our destiny, it behoves us to submit to it; if the Gods will that you live as Court, they will draw you thither, whether you endeavour it or no; and if they do not, you will but torment your self in vain. But in brief, not to repeat to you all the discourse of the solitary Andronodorus to Cloranisbes, I shall tell you that he comforted him, and that Cloranisbes resolving to comply with his fortune without tormenting himself more, contracted a friendship with this wise old man to whom he offer'd his house to retire into, which he would not accept, and return'd home without caring for any other counsel but that of Artemidorus. And therefore he writ to his Friends at Utica, that they would give over soliciting for his revocation, telling them it was sufficient if they only maintain'd that he had done nothing to deserve his disfavour, and that he desir'd nothing more from their assistance. He writ this to them so earnestly, that they obey'd his pleasure, and as Princes easily enough forget what they do not see, and delight in, the Prince of Carthage no longer thought of Cloranisbes. For my part I much regretted him; for I was his Friend; but, in fine, it behov'd him to comfort himself for his absence, and I comforted my self sweetly enough with two or three Mistresses, which I courted about that time. Nevertheless, as jovial as you see me, I can assure you Cloranisbes was better pleas'd with me than with any of his Friends; for I had the confidence to ask the Prince's permission to go see him in his Desert, though I knew well enough that the Princess of Carthage was offended at it. In the mean time Cloranisbes delighted himself in his solitude with embellishing his house, which he made very agreeable; he also addict'd himself much to reading; and having slaves that were skill'd in Musick, he diverted himself very innocently. The first time I visited him, I found him so merry, so satisfied with his retirement, in so good health, and with such tranquillity of mind, that I took occasion to jest with him about it. How? (said I to him) Cloranisbes, so goodly a person, so full of wit, so rational, so fit for society and gallantry, be happy with Meadows, Rivers, Woods and Fountains? What? can Cloranisbes be so jovial as I see him, without Nymphs, without Ladies, without Shepherdesses, and without having so much as one poor Iris? Yes (answer'd he, smiling) and I am so pleas'd in having no need of any but my self to be happy, as no man can be more. I confess to you, I laugh'd at his wisdom, I gave him the hearing of all that his Hermite had said to him, but he did not convert me; I left him to his opinion, and carried back my own. Six months after, I went again to visit him; but I found him much chang'd, he seem'd sad and paler than ordinary; and though he was more decent, and even more magnificent than I had seen him formerly, yet I perceiv'd well something troubled his mind. Methinks (said I to him as soon as I observ'd it) your countenance tells me your felicity of solitude has not lasted you very long. Cloranisbes smil'd to hear me speak thus, but though he told me he was sick, yet I knew that his malady was rather in mind than body. But being I was to stay with him some days, I would not press him too much at first, and we went to walk together upon a Terrace, the prospect of which was very handsome. After which, having some orders to give to a Painter who was embellishing a Banqueting-house at the end of his Garden, he ask'd me liberty to go thither, and left me to walk whither I would. Wherefore having a purpose to inquire of a man that belong'd to him, with whom he intrusted many things, I went to seek him in the house, from one room to another, and not finding him, I stay'd at last in Cloranisbes closet which I found open. And being naturally curious, I could not see Verses upon the Table without reading them; for knowing Cloranisbes made very good, and perceiving those that lay there were written with his own hand, my curiosity was redoubled. So that taking them up, I read them with much pleasure, because they seem'd very amorous. But that which made me consider them more, was, for that I accounted them an infallible proof that Cloranisbes was in love, and that his sadness

Madness only proceeded from thence. At the same instant a conceit coming in my head to play a prank with him, I set my self with all diligence to copy them out, and I was so happy that I had done transcribing them a good while before I found Cloranisbes again. For I went out of his Closet without being seen by any person, and going forth of the house enter'd into an Orchard to take a good long turn, feigning to seek for Cloranisbes, who at last met me. All the evening I found him sufficiently sad, though he endeavor'd to seem otherwise: I pretended to be a little weary and sleepy, to the end I might retire in good time. So being led to my apartment, I was at liberty to execute the design I had. I spent all the evening in translating those Verses into Greek; for I had formerly travell'd into Greece, and so had Cloranisbes. So that that language was not unknown to us.

Having pass'd the night in this Translation, I slept so late, that Cloranisbes, fearing I was not well, came to my chamber, and ask'd me whether I were sick, slothful, or sleepy. I assure you (said I to him, awaking my self) I cannot tell you which; and besides (added I) you were so pensive last night, that I imagin'd I should do you a pleasure in leaving you to entertain your own thoughts. You are not wont to be so complacent to the lots of your own pleasure (answer'd Cloranisbes); but however rise, and let us walk; I obey'd him, and we went together into a Grove which is extremely agreeable. We had not gone a hundred paces in it, but turning my self toward him; See, Cloranisbes (said I to him) a very fit place to make Verses in, and I doubt not but your desire has occasion'd you to write excellent things. Solitary people (answer'd he) have so few subjects to write of, that their fancies furnish them with nothing agreeable; for, to tell you the truth, 'tis so common to declaim against Fortune, that I would not chuse it. For my part (reply'd I) Verses that are not of Love, must be admirably good to please me; for since Verses were no doubt invented for Love and Mirth, they must have something of both, to charm me. But as to the matter of verses (added I) I must shew you, an Elegie that was given me, which in my conceit is very passionate, and I have made a Copy of them my self, to give you. In speaking this, I drew forth the Translation which I had of Cloranisbes Elegy into Greek out of his own Language, which naturally is not very fit for Poetry. At first Cloranisbes took it without thinking to find any thing in it that he knew; but he had scarce read four Verses, when looking upon me, Ha! Amilcar (said he to me) see the greatest chance in the world. How? (said I to him very seriously.) The sense of these four Verses (reply'd he) agrees so exactly with four which I made, that nothing was ever seen so like. Such things always surprize when they happen (answer'd I coldly) but 'tis not very frequent; and I my self (added I confidently) have made Verses which I have found almost word for word in Hesiod, whom I had not read at the time when I made them. So that it could not be said that they remain'd in my memory unwittingly, and that I believ'd I compos'd them though I only remembred them. Therefore 'tis not to be much wonder'd at, that your conceit should jump with that of another; and when conformity is only in the sense and not in the words, the chance is less marvellous. After this, Cloranisbes proceeded to read; but the more he read the more he was astonish'd; he stopt at each Verse with incredible amazement, and not imagining it possible for me to have seen his Verses, or having seen them, to have had time to translate them, he made exclamations at every word; and having told me a hundred times, This is strange, this is admirable, this is wonderful, this is incredible, and testified his amazement in all manners he could, he was, in fine, wholly astonish'd that I was not so at all. No doubt (added he) 'tis because you believe there are some thoughts in the Verses you shew me, which resemble those which I have made. I certainly believe so (answer'd I) and I wonder as much at your astonishment, as you do at the conformity of your Verses with these which I shew you. Ha! Amilcar (cry'd he) you do not understand how the matter is; and to force you to admiration, mark well the Elegy which I am going to repeat to you, and if you do not find that the beginning, continuance, and end are the same, never believe me. After which Cloranisbes repeated his Elegy, and I taking my turn to feign astonishment, stopt at every Verse, and made cries of admiration, which surpass'd all his before. But in fine (said I to him, after he had done repeating the Elegy) it is impossible this should be the effect of meer chance; you must have borrow'd this sense from some other, or some other from you. Cloranisbes then fell to make a thousand Oaths to me, that he had never before seen the Verses which I shew'd him. It must be a long while then (said I to him) since you compos'd yours; you gave Copies of them when you were in Greece, and some one that understands our Language, desir'd to enrich his own with them. That cannot be (answer'd he) for 'tis but three days ago that these Verses were made, and I have not shew'd them to any whatsoever. So that this accident must be look'd upon as a prodigy. But do you know (added he) who is the Author of those Verses which so much resemble mine? No (answer'd I confidently) but a Kinsman of Thespi sent them to me by a Ship that came to Utica. But as far as I perceive (added I) you make Love-Verses in your solitude.

But as far as I perceive (said Platina interrupting him) you intend that we shall not hear Cloranisbes Verses, and you have forgot that Valeria understands the language into which you translated them well enough, to hear them with pleasure. I have not forgotten any thing that is lovely in you (answer'd Amilcar) but because I was but the Translator of those Verses, I durst not shew you them unless you had commanded me, though I something desir'd it. But since you have some curiosity for them, you shall have them in your own language; for when I began to understand it, I translated them a second time in this manner. See then what were the sentiments of Cloranisbes.

Elegy to Melantha.

IT was within a pleasing solitude,
Where free from cares and from inquietude,
My thoughts an undisturb'd serenity found,
And in themselves my easie wishes crown'd.
A goodly plain, a Meadow flowry fair,
With the soft courtship of the perfum'd air,
Censuring the fields, or bubbling streams that pass
O'er pebbles, or that thrid the matted grass;

*The charming notes of birds that move delight,
And the more charming silence of the night,
Courts noiseful pleasures taught me to despise,
And joys of undesigning shades to prize.
There I without ambition, love, or strife,
Pass'd the soft minutes of a carelefs life;
Until Melantha's fatal beauty found
My desert out; straight from th' unhappy ground Away the disenchanted pleasures flew;
And rest for ever bad my Soul adieu.
Since then my mind by melancholy seiz'd,
And raging pangs of jealousie diseas'd,
Like a crack'd Mirror thousand forms doth shew
Of Rivals, whom Melantha never knew.
My lightest wish was death, hopeless to move
That heart that only could ambition love.
And still the more I pay'd profound respect,
My slighted service found the more neglect;
As if my adoration were a crime,
Or dying sighs were murmurs out of time.
And yet obdurate as she is, I find
No other passion can divers my mind
While she not pitying my forlorn estate
Can find no easier object for her hate.
If it be so, ye Gods, I only crave
That last relief despairing Lovers have.
May grief destroy me, and Melantha find
A Victim fit for her ambitious mind.*

If Clorambes's Verses (said Valeria) be as passionate as yours, he must certainly have been very amorous. For my part (added Plotina) I do not doubt of it; for Amilcar's Verses are ordinarily more sprightly than these, but not so passionate. However (added she, turning towards him) proceed if you please to the sequel of the History of Clorambes; for I extremely long to know whether he told you upon whom he made these so amorous Verses.

I am so desirous to obey you, Madam (answer'd Amilcar) that I will not stay to answer the illusive commendation you have given the Verses which I make. To return therefore where I was, I shall tell you, that turning myself towards Clorambes, But as far as I perceive (said I to him) you make Love-Verses in your solitude, and make them as well as if you were amorous. Nevertheless I do not much believe that you can be so; for to speak truth, there are not many African Ladies to be found in the Countrey that are fit to take such hearts as that of Clorambes. Alas! (answer'd he sighing) I thought indeed to live in safety in my Desert: but, to my unhappiness, I have seen so divine a person here, that I have not been able to resist her charms. Then I press'd Clorambes to tell me who that fair one was, where he had seen her, and how he became in Love with her: for as for the name of Melantha which you give her in your Verses (said I to him) I know 'tis but a name of love. Clorambes told me that since he was banish'd he had seen but two or three of his Friends, and my self, who had visit'd him twice, excepting the solitary Andronodorus whom he saw very frequently; till one day, walking in a great Waste that leads to the way which goes to Massilia, he beheld a handsome slave, who saluting him respectfully, told him, some Ladies of quality desir'd him to permit them to see his Garden. Wherefore having not yet forgot to be civil, he answer'd him that he should joyfully receive the honour which they would do his house. But that he might not fail in the respect which it behov'd him to give them, he ask'd the slave their names; and was told that there was the wife of a man of chief quality of Massilia at a house not far distant from his; that this Lady's name was Cyrene; that she had her daughter with her who was nam'd Lysonice, and two of her kinswomen who dwelt with her. The slave added also that, to divert them, Cyrene purpos'd to let them see all the fair houses thereabouts. Upon which Clorambes sending the slave back speedily, prepar'd himself to receive these Ladies in the best manner he could, though it was something troublesome to him at that time to be oblig'd to spend a day in Ceremony; for in the humour he was in then, he could have lik'd better to see a Painter at work whom he had in his house, or hear a slave sing that belong'd to him and had an excellent voice, or entertain himself with a Book, or his own thoughts, than to receive Ladies whom he believ'd he should never see more than this time. Nevertheless in consideration of civility, he order'd his servants to make preparation to receive them. And then causing a handsome horse to be brought to him, he rid to meet them as far as he could. When he approach'd their Chariot he first beheld Cyrene, who though of good age seem'd to him to have a graceful countenance. But presently after all that were with her lifting up their Vails he saw the charming Lysonice her daughter, and he saw her so beautiful, that his eyes were dazzled, his heart was mov'd, and his reason almost wholly laid aside at that moment, so that he had like to have made his complement to Lysonice without speaking at all to Cyrene or her Friends, who were notwithstanding very amiable. Yet at length he recollected himself from his dumb admiration; and beginning to speak, I would not have believ'd, Madam, (said Clorambes to Cyrene) that an unfortunate Exile could have receiv'd so great an honour; and if I could have foreseen it, I would have endeavour'd to put my Desert in a condition to divert so fair a company. Since we find you in it, (answer'd Cyrene obligingly) we have nothing more to desire. For my part (added one of her Kinswomen, whose name was Pasilia) when the Master of the house is a person of merit, I do not much care to find that the Garden-plots and walks are not decently kept. I am altogether of your mind (added a sprightly Virgin nam'd Delisia.) And as for me (said the fair Lysonice) I have at present the greatest consolation in the World, in seeing an Exile who is neither savage or incivil; for whereas we our selves are Exiles, it makes me hope that we shall preserve some civility in our Desert, since Clorambes has retain'd so much in his. What? Madam (cry'd Clorambes looking upon Lysonice) can such a person as you be exil'd? If it be so, it must needs be only because your beauty is too redoubtable to those that banish you. Clorambes had no sooner said this, but Lysonice blush'd, and he perceiv'd it would have been better to have spoken of the worth of Ladies in general than of Lysonice in particular; but it was not in his power to repress his first sentiment. But Cyrene, to interrupt the praises given her daughter, entreated Clorambes that he would do them the favour to let them see his house. And so, they went thither-wards slowly, continuing their discourse.

Cyrene told Clorambes that the King of Massilia had banish'd the valiant Boftar her Husband by the artifices of some enviers he had in this Court, and that having

having been sent to a house of his own upon the frontier, he had obey'd, and arriv'd there only fifteen days ago. Cloraniſes heard with pleasure that which Cyrene ſaid to him; and though he knew no reaſon for it, yet he was glad that Lyſonice was an Exile, and that he had ſome conformity with ſo fair a perſon. At length having paſſ'd a great Waſte and two Courts, this fair company alighted before a ſtately entrance of ſtone-ſteps: for though the Architecture of this houſe is ſomething barbarous, 'tis notwithstanding magnificent. For inſtead of the Statues of the Graces, Venus, Diana, or Apollo, as in other places, here were repreſented huge Lyons, Tygers and Panthers; and in imboſſ'd imagery, Crocodiles devouring paſſengers, frays of ſavage beaſts, and ſhapes of the moſt extraordinary monſters that have been ſeen in Africa. But, in fine, this houſe is very handſome though built after the ancient mode; ſo that Cyrene commend-ed it with as much earneſtneſs as a perſon could do that deſir'd to pleaſe the Maſter of it. I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid Cloraniſes to her) do not ſo extol a thing which does not deſerve it; for I am none of thoſe who ſeek to be commended for what has been made by Architects who are dead many ages ago; and if you have any thing to commend me for, it muſt be (added he ſmiling) for not having lov'd Lyons, Tygers and Panthers ſo much as my Anceſtors. In ſpeaking this, he oblig'd Cyrene to enter into a Hall, the painting of which was newly finiſh'd, where the hiſtory of Diana was admirably repreſented. It not being uſual in Maſſilia to ſee ſuch rare Pictures, all the Ladies were charm'd with thoſe, and ſtay'd a good time to behold them, during which they all made it apparent that they were infinitely ingenious, and eſpecially Lyſonice. After this Cloraniſes cauſ'd them to paſs into a Chamber hung with Tapeſtry of Sydon; for having been a great Traveller, he had renounc'd the ſimplicity of Numidia. Then he led them into a Cabinet open on three ſides, the proſpect of which was very handſome; it was full of Pictures, Books, and Muſical Inſtruments; and round about it were Cuſhions wrought with flowers, and a plat of Sea-bull-ruſhes cover'd the floor. But as far as I perceive (ſaid Lyſonice pleaſantly when the company was all ſet) you purpoſe to be eternally baniſh'd, by ſo delightfully adorning your Deſart. Yet I am not of your humour; for I ſhall always ſo fancy to my ſelf to return to the Court in a few days, that I look upon all the deformities of a diſorder'd houſe as things which comfort me, and aſſure me I ſhall not ſtay long there. You are ſo fit for the World (anſwer'd Cloraniſes) that 'tis not to be wonder'd if you love it: but you are alſo ſo amiable, that you ought never to fear ſolitude in what place ſoever you be. I know not whether I can fear ſolitude (reply'd ſhe) but I am ſure I very much fear bad company; and that which makes me diſlike continuing in the Countrey, is not ſo much the fear of ſeeing no body, as of ſeeing people that diſpleaſe me. I believe what you ſay (anſwer'd De-liſia) but I believe too that you love agreeable company. I grant it (reply'd ſhe) but I had rather not ſee any whatſoever, than ſee ſome whom I diſlike. Did you conſider well what you ſay, Daughter (ſaid Cyrene ſmiling) you would not ſpeak ſo poſitively. Indeed (added Pafilia) they who have ſo ambitious a ſoul as you, can never think it poſſible for themſelves to conform to ſolitude; which is a way repugnant to ambition. I beſeech you (ſaid Lyſonice) do not uſe railery upon me before ſuch a perſon as Cloraniſes, who does not know me ſo well as to diſcern how far he ought to believe you. No, no, Madam (anſwer'd Cloraniſes) do not fear that I think any thing of you which is not to your advantage; for your beauty ſo powerfully diſpoſes hearts to judge favourably of you, that I find I cannot believe any thing againſt you. Since 'tis ſo (ſaid Lyſonice, perceiving her Mother was talking to Pafilia at a window) I deſie you to ſpeak all that you pleaſe. Then I ſhall tell Cloraniſes (ſaid De-liſia to whom ſhe ſpoke) what a diſpute we had by the way as we came hither; and I believe, as prepoſſeſſ'd as he is with your beauty, he will not acknowledge that your ſentiment is more juſt than mine. We ſhall ſee that (anſwer'd Lyſonice coldly.) I beſeech you (ſaid Cloraniſes then to De-liſia) do not force me to be againſt you. Provided you will ſwear to me (anſwer'd ſhe) that you will judge ſincerely and without partiality, I deſire no more of you; and without ſo much as expecting your oath, you ſhall know that, after much diſcourſe too long to relate, Lyſonice gave us to underſtand that ſhe ſhould like better to marry a King whom ſhe hated, and who ſhould always hate her, than a man whom ſhe lov'd, and who always ſhould love her, if he were of a mean fortune. The meannels of mine (reply'd Cloraniſes) no doubt ought to make me declare againſt Lyſonice; but ſince I judge nothing according to my own intereſts, I cannot reſolve to condemn her without firſt hearing her.

For my part (ſaid Lyſonice) ſince inclination is a thing which ariſes in us without the help of our reaſon, I might, if I would, diſpenſe with ſpeaking any thing upon this matter; but however, I will acknowledge ingenuouſly, that ambition ſeems to me the moſt noble paſſion of all. I know not, whether it be the moſt noble (anſwer'd Cloraniſes) but I know well it is not the moſt ſweet. Be it what it will (ſaid ſhe) I apprehend a thouſand pleaſures in ſeeing ones ſelf above all thoſe that ſurround us, and I fancy tedious diſcontentment in a mean fortune. As for me (ſaid De-liſia) I ſhould account my ſelf more happy with a plain ſhepherd whom I lov'd, than with a King whom I hated. If I hated his perſon (anſwer'd Lyſonice) I ſhould love the degree he advanc'd me to, and his greatneſs. But if I lov'd a ſhepherd (reply'd De-liſia) I ſhould be contented with his fortune, I ſhould love him even to his Cottage, and I ſhould be more happy in ſeeing him feed his Flocks by a River ſide, than you would be upon the Throne, if you ſhar'd it with a Prince whom you hated. Believe me (anſwer'd Lyſonice); Love is a fine thing in Verſes and in Pictures; but conſidering it a little prudently, I think all the bleſſings of it are very imaginary. If you examine ambition aright (reply'd De-liſia) you will ſee that all the favours of Fortune do not affect the Soul ſenſibly. 'Tis true (ſaid Cloraniſes) the deſires of Love proceed directly from the heart, but thoſe of ambition only from the mind. I do not underſtand theſe diſtinctions very well (anſwer'd Lyſonice) but I know, the thought of being a Queen flatters my heart pleaſingly; and that of being lov'd makes no great impreſſion in my mind. 'Tis becauſe you do not conſider (reply'd Cloraniſes) there can be any thing in the world worthy of being lov'd by you; and becauſe 'tis more eaſie for you to imagine that there ſhould be a King ſo juſt as to make you a Queen, and give you a Crown which Fortune has not given you. You draw your ſelf very civilly out of this matter (ſaid Lyſonice) but nevertheleſs, I know know you judge me too ambitious, and therefore I will not give you leisure to explain your self more clearly, for fear Delisia triumph to my disadvantage; moreover, 'tis fit to mind my Mother, that we have not too much time to see the Gardens of so fair a house, and to return home. And so rising up, the oblig'd Cyrene to go walk, and this lovely company went to see the Gardens, the Orchards, and a Grove which was behind them; but they were much surpris'd to find a very noble and handsome Collation in a Banqueting-house which stood in the middle of the Grove. With which while these Ladies were entertain'd, they were delighted with the noise of a little consort of Countrey-Musick, very agreeably. And after it was ended, the Musician which belong'd to Cloraniſbes, fung admirably well; by which time it was grown late, and so the Ladies went away extremely satisfied with the civility, wit, and magnificence of Cloraniſbes, who with several of his Attendants conducted them half their way. When he left, Cyrene desir'd him to go and visit them, and he told her, that having intended to request her permission to do it, he should not fail to obey her: after which they parted. Cloraniſbes, as he return'd home, was sufficiently pensive, though he did not imagine that he was fallen in Love. Yet the idea of Lysonice accompanied him in all places; which, being it was agreeable, he did not care to extinguish out of his memory, but on the contrary entertain'd it with pleasure. The next day going to see a Painter work, whom he had at his house, he found him more merry than ordinary; of which desiring to know the cause, Whence comes it (said he to him) that I see you so joyful? My Lord (answer'd he) I have been a whole moneth seeking in my fancy for an air of a head to make a Venus, and could not hit upon one; but I found one yesterday without trouble; for whilst the Ladies were at the Collation in the Banqueting-house of the Grove, I stole the Picture of her they nam'd Lysonice. How? (said Cloraniſbes surpris'd) could you make any thing that resembles her? Yes, my Lord (answer'd he) and upon the plain design which I made yesterday, I am confident to make an excellent Picture for resemblance. I pray do not execute your intention (said Cloraniſbes smiling) for it would disturb my quiet, if I saw Lysonice's Picture often. Nevertheless, Cloraniſbes askt him to shew him the draught which he had made, and found it very much resembling. He also desir'd to keep it; but the Painter who had a Venus to make, was so importunate with him, that he was constrain'd to let him have it to make use of for his intended Piece.

The next day Cloraniſbes went to see Andronodorus, and told him of the Adventure he had had; for after he had cur'd him of his ambition, he gave him an account of whatever hapned to him. But he had no sooner done relating to him the visit he had receiv'd, but the wife Hermit taking his turn to speak, Ha! Cloraniſbes (said he to him) have a care of your self; for love is not much better than ambition, and if I am not mistaken, your heart has more propensity to submit to the Tyranny of the one than of the other. I confess it wise Andronodorus (answer'd Cloraniſbes) in this case methinks 'tis so easie for my Reason to defend my heart, that I ought not to fear being surpris'd. For Lysonice and I have so different interests, that I think it is not easie for Love and Fortune joyn'd together to unite us; and besides, I have already observ'd Lysonice has a very ambitious Soul, and so it would be in vain for an Exile to offer to become her Servant. Yet, I say once more have a care of your self (reply'd Andronodorus) for if there be no other obstacles than those you mention, to keep you from being in love, you are so already; for 'tis certain, difficulty produces a greater progress towards love than facility. Beware then to fortifie your Reason well, if you mind not to lose the contentment you have obtain'd. But do you think (said Cloraniſbes) there is no Love commendable? I think there may be (answer'd this wise old man) and I grant there is nothing more excellent than a lawful, tender, and constant Love: but Cloraniſbes, where will you find two persons that Love one another, who have minds so generous, hearts so tender, and Souls so constant, as to love one another ardently and for ever? And yet without all these conditions, Love is but a weakness, a crime and a folly. So that, considering the almost impossibility to find a woman which deserves to be lov'd, or knows how to love, 'tis best for a man to preserve his liberty. Love founded upon beauty can never out-live it, and many times dies before it: Love which is establish'd out of vanity, is but vanity it self, and cannot last: that which proceeds from the interests of Fortune, is nothing but covetousness; that which is inspir'd only by youth, passes away with it, and is nothing but levity and inconstancy: that which arises from the temper or constitution, is blind, gross, and brutish: and there is none durable or commendable, but that which is produc'd by virtue. Defend your self then courageously against Love, if you believe me, and suffer not your self to be surpris'd by so dangerous an Enemy. Do not flatter your self with the thought that there may be calm Loves: for,

*As spring without West-winds has never been,
So Love without desires was never seen.*

Therefore enjoy the quiet in which you are, Cloraniſbes, and remember that flight is the only course that can secure you.

The discourse of Andronodorus very much mov'd Cloraniſbes; and yet he could not resolve to forbear giving a visit to Cyrene and Lysonice, but he really purpos'd to go thither but once. At his return home, he found his Painter had finish'd the head of his Venus, and that this Picture so much resembled Lysonice that it was the same. His heart was mov'd with it, and he could not behold it without pleasure and disturbance; nevertheless, at the same time he laugh'd at himself for his weakness, and so went to his rest. But the next morning he could not keep himself from going again to Lysonice's Picture, and the day following he went to the house of the valiant Bostar, father of this fair person, who receiv'd him with extraordinary careſſes, and led him to the apartment of Cyrene, where Lysonice, Pasilia, and Delisia were. Whereas he had receiv'd these Ladies with much civility before, they receiv'd him so now; and this obliging reception adding something to the charms of Lysonice, prov'd a further ingagement of the heart of Cloraniſbes. At first Bostar began to discourse about their common misfortunes, by which they were both exil'd; complaining that Princes ordinarily think themselves dispens'd with from ingratitude, and that they owe nothing to those which serve them; then, lamenting their unhappiness, in that they can scarce ever distinguish flatterers from their true friends, nor know the clear truth; and which is worst, care not to know it, being being willing to be deceiv'd but not recompense such as are faithful to them; and finally, in that they do more good to those that hurt them, than to those that have done them service. But after this Bostar being retir'd upon occasion of some business, the conversation was chang'd, and became pleasant, mirthful, and diverting, that Cloranisbes, to his unhappiness, judg'd this converse more delightful than with the solitary Andronodorus. He offer'd to return home at night, but Bostar and Cyrene detain'd him till the next day: whereby having had more time to know Lysonice's wit, he was so taken with it, that he perceiv'd it would be very troublesome to him to resist her. All her discourse was agreeable, and though she had a little vehemence in her mind, yet her eyes shew'd so much sweetness, and that vehemence was so sprightly, that she made it part of her gracefulness.

Thus Cloranisbes who went thither free, return'd home without almost the least doubting of his Captivity. Yet he stay'd six days before he went again to the house of Bostar, during which the poor Andronodorus dy'd. This loss afflicted him, and perhaps would have hindred him from returning so soon to Cyrene's house, if all those fair exile, had not sent a complement to oblige him to visit them. His sadness being discernable in his countenance, they askt him the cause of it; which having told them, Lysonice spoke with astonishment concerning such as confine themselves to eternal solitude, not being able to comprehend how 'tis possible for any one to renounce society for ever. But she spoke so ingeniously, that though her discourse was repugnant to the sentiments Cloranisbes had at that time, he was an exceeding admirer of her. But not to insist upon such small matters, having greater to tell you; The more Cloranisbes beheld Lysonice, the more charming he found her, and became the more amorous.

Shortly after Bostar took his turn to visit him, and so did all the Ladies, who were extremely amaz'd to see the Picture of Lysonice at his house. This beautiful Virgin immediately blisht at the sight of it, and askt Cloranisbes where he took it. When you have told me (answer'd he softly) fair Lysonice where you have put the heart you have taken from me, I shall tell you how I came by your Picture. Believe me (Cloranisbes reply'd she) if you had my Picture no more than I have your heart, you would not have it at all. You mean, Madam (answer'd he) that you would not have it be yours. In good earnest (said she to him) I conceive women in banishment do not much mind taking of hearts; and men in the same condition have enough to do to support their adversity, without suffering them to be taken imprudently. Ah! too charming Lysonice (answer'd Cloranisbes) 'tis always pertinent to love you. This little conversation was at this time interrupted; for Cyrene, Delisia, and Pasilia, who had stay'd to consider the Picture, came and joynd with them; but, in fine, though what Cloranisbes said to Lysonice might have been taken only in the way of gallantry, yet he was glad he had spoken. As for Lysonice, she made no reflection upon it at that time. I do not tell you that Cloranisbes gave this fair company all the divertisement, that could be had in the Countrey: but I assure you he became desperately amorous of Lysonice; and having the counsels of Andronodorus no longer, the remembrance of those he had formerly given him was too weak to withstand the charms of this admirable

Lady, whom then he saw very frequently. Moreover he sought an opportunity to speak to her of his growing passion; and found it; but he receiv'd him so fiercely, that he was more miserable after he had discover'd his love to her than before. Believe me, Cloranisbes (said she to him one day when she conjur'd her to suffer him to love her) Love is not suitable for the unhappy; nor does it belong to the unfortunate to love one another: it would be too much to have complaints to make both of Fortune and Love at the same time. Ha! Madam (said Cloranisbes to her) I am perswaded you cannot but have a great aversion for me; for if it were not so, you would on the contrary find there would be some sweetness to your self in reigning absolutely in my heart; and that love is a consolation of all sorts of infelicities. No, no, Cloranisbes (said she to him) do not imagine I have any aversion for you, for I assure you I know very well all the excellent qualities you are indow'd with; but you are an Exile; and so am I. I love the World, I am ambitious, and I hate solitude: judge then, whether, as things now stand, 'tis possible for you to render me happy. But, Madam (answer'd he) Fortune may change, and 'tis ealie for me not to be perpetually in banishment. Nor but that I could easily dispense with the World if I enjoy'd you (added he) but since you love it, I will love it too for your sake, I will hate Solitude, and Love shall anew inspire me with ambition.

Thus (amiable Plotina) stood the case of Cloranisbes with Lysonice; when I was at his house, when I found those Love-verses; and when I play'd the prank of translating them, to perplex him. After this afflicted Lover had related to me all that I have rehears'd to you, he complain'd of his unhappiness in a most passionate manner. For, my dear Amilear (said he to me) no man alive can love more ardently than I do; none can have less hope than I have; and finally, none can resent greater torment. I know Lysonice has several Lovers at the Court of Magalia, who bestir themselves to their power to make Bostar's peace: so that if he be recall'd, I shall lose Lysonice for ever, and live in my Desert tormented with love, jealousy and despair. Bostar, without doubt, does not hate me (added he) Cyrene loves me very tenderly; and Pasilia and Delisia are for me; but Lysonice, with all her esteem, is sensible to nothing but ambition. But however (said I) is not her heart sensible of joy? Yes (answer'd he) and I know not whether it be partly because she loves pleasures and is very ambitious. If you credit me (reply'd I) instead of complaining continually as you do, I had to divert her, carry me to Bostar's house, to whom I will give hope of your return to Ustica, and suffer me a while to observe your Mistress. But if you should go and become my Rival (answer'd Cloranisbes) I should be much more unhappy. If I should (reply'd I smiling) it would be probably for so short a time, that I should not have leisure to prejudice you. For besides that 'tis seldom I have any long Loves, I am to stay here but eight days; so that my absence would cure me of my passion.

At that time, charming Plotina, you had not yet taught me to love constantly. But, in fine, Cloranisbes promis'd to carry me the day following to Bostar's house. Where accordingly, I found that Cyrene was a handsome woman, to whom one might still offer an idle heart, without being liable to blame; I found Pasilia very amiable; Delisia infinitely agreeable; and and Lysonice so fair and so charming, that if my Friend had not lov'd her, I should have infallibly become her servant. But because I would not augment his miseries, I hastned as much as possibly I could to make choice between Pasilia and Delisia. And having well consider'd them both, I fix'd my self upon Delisia. Whereas I came from the Court, Lysonice receiv'd me with joy; and when I said I believ'd Cloranisbes was likely to be recall'd speedily, she treated him a little better that day than ordinary. Moreover, I describ'd the Court of Utica to her so gallant, and the vicinity of Carthage so commodious and pleasant, that methought, if Cloranisbes were recall'd, she would easily resolve to marry him. In the Interim, it being my happiness to please all this fair company, Bostar propos'd to us to stay at his house, during the eight days allotted me to abide with Cloranisbes. Wherefore, conceiving it would be advantageous to my Friend if we accepted his offer, I carri'd the matter so handsomly, that they seem'd almost to force us to stay there. In this time I lov'd Delisia, I did not hate Pasilia, I was very complacential to Cyrene, and I also lov'd a young Phœnician Virgin who came to Bostar's house, and whose name was Phelinice. She is indeed a very lovely Lady, of an indifferent stature, but extreme well shap'd; she has a round visage, a little dimple in her chin, a lively complexion, a somewhat high forehead, a handsome mouth, a very pleasing smile, black and sparkling eyes, purely white hands, and hair of the fairest bright chestnut, that ever was seen; which is very rare in that Countrey. But though Phelinice be always very agreeable, yet she is infinitely more upon one of these days in which she has a certain sweet and a little caressing complacency, which becomes her admirably. She is naturally good, discreet, and generous; she is both debonaire and melancholy; she is very ingenious, and is capable of more things than many others who make greater ostentation than she. Pleasure is sufficiently suitable to her inclination, though she can dispense with it when 'tis fitting to do so; as for her friends, she loves them well, but yet a little less than she thinks, because she does not believe her self so well lov'd by them as she really is; and having taken up a conceit, that true friendship may be without an absolute confiding intimacy, it is hard for her to escape the upbraidings of her Friends. Yet this does not hinder her from being very amiable and very worthy to be lov'd; and therefore I lov'd her at least as much as Delisia and Pasilia. But being she was but one day with us, I was quit of her for four and twenty hours love.

The eight days we stay'd there, were spent very delightfully; for having no other design but to divert our selves, we satisfied our desires, notwithstanding all the ambition of Lysonice. We went a hunting and a fishing, we walkt, we made jovial Sonnets, and extemporary Verses; we sometimes talk'd seriously, and many times otherwise, and, in brief, we had very diverting conversations. That which often render'd them agreeable, was, for that there liv'd rustical people in the places adjacent, whose countrey modes made Lysonice desperate, and gave her occasion to declare against the Countrey very agreeably. But forasmuch as I know well enough how to counterfeit all sorts of people, I diverted her sufficiently in conversing with these people, as if I had been one of them. For I could imitate their looks, speak their language, and transform my self absolutely into a noble Bumkin. And by this folly I drew pleasure from a thing which otherwise would have been very disgustful to her.

In the mean time Cloranisbes employ'd all his endeavours to win the heart of Lysonice; he knew well that she esteem'd him; and nothing was so prejudicial to him as his quality of being an Exile: but this difficulty was in a manner insuperable, and made him extremely unhappy. And the more, because he durst not hope to make his peace with the Prince of Carthage; for I had given him to understand that it was the Princess who was his chief enemy. However, he dissembled his sentiments, and omitted nothing whereby he might please Lysonice. But at length the eight days being ended, I departed, and I dare say, Cloranisbes and I left behind us some regret for our absence. For my part, I was melancholy till I return'd to Utica, but especially at my leaving of Cloranisbes amidst the inquietudes of his violent affection. I promis'd him at parting, to do him all the service lay in my power, and indeed I did not fail of my word. And I had a better opportunity to do it than at any time before, because the Princess of Carthage, who alone had procur'd Cloranisbes disgrace, was now out of favour with the Prince her self, and constrain'd to retire into the Countrey. I forgot to tell you, that when I took leave of Cloranisbes, I promis'd him not to discover his passion to any, nor so much as to say I had seen Lysonice; and that in my return, the Painter who had workt for him in his Desert, follow'd me and came to Utica. For that Cloranisbes had desir'd me to assist him as much as I could, I did not fail to do so; and he soon got employment.

Now the Prince of Carthage having some secret design to make War, and knowing that Bostar was banish'd from the Court of the King his Master, that he liv'd not far from Cloranisbes, and had a very strong place which belong'd to him, he purpos'd to gain him to his interest, to the end to make him declare for them; wherefore having happily dispos'd him to recall Cloranisbes, I acted so dextrously that he gave me Commission to send to my Friend that he might return. This news made Cloranisbes both joyful and sorrowful; for knowing his exile was an obstacle to him to be lov'd by Lysonice, he was glad for being recall'd to Court; but then he was on the other side extremely afflicted, for that he could not cease to be an exile without being absent from his Mistress. Nevertheless whereas this absence might possibly prove to the advantage of his Love, he resolv'd upon it, and went to take his leave of Bostar, Cyrene, Lysonice, and the Ladies his Friends. He promis'd them to return to see them, and desir'd their permission to write to them. Lysonice was more pleasing towards him this day, than she had been ever before, and having an opportunity to entertain her apart for a quarter of an hour, Suffer me, Madam (said he to her) to complaint of the joy which the end of my banishment gives you. You ought rather to thank me for it (said she to him) for 'tis a sign that I sensibly interest my self in your happiness. But, Madam (reply'd he) is it possible for one that has given you his heart to be happy when he is absent from you? I know not whether or no you will be happy at Utica (answer'd she) but I know well you would have been always unhappy here. But, Cloranisbes (added this fair Virgin) I will not have you go away ill satisfied of me; know then, that I am perswaded, when one loves another ardently, he ought always to study more to content him, than his own pleasure; and so, when a Lover studies only to enjoy his Mistress, without considering whether he can render her fortune happy, he loves but imperfectly. Therefore conceiving that adversity and love cannot subsist together, I have been unwilling to encourage the affection you pretend towards me, for fear of increasing your unhappiness. But, in fine, I esteem you infinitely, and if I were capable of love, I doubt not but I should affect you rather than any other. This, Cloraniſbes, is all that can be said by an Exile to a man who is not yet wholly discharg'd of his banishment (if I may so speak) an exile, I say, who accounts nothing more unjust than not always to employ the greatest endeavours for advancing the greatness and honour of the person lov'd.

Mistress,

Although this which Lysonice said to Cloraniſbes was not too obliging, nevertheless perceiving that she was willing to give him a little hope, he was ravish'd with it, and us'd the most passionate and exquisite blandishments to her that the most ardent love can inspire an Idiomate with; after which, he came back to Utica. I had a purpose to have gone to meet him, and give him notice that his Painter, who had kept a copy of Lysonice's picture, had shew'd it to the Prince; who was so charm'd with Lysonice's beauty, that he kept the Picture and plac'd it in his Chamber: but the Prince having taken me to hunting with him, Cloraniſbes arriv'd at Utica a quarter of an hour before we return'd hither. And going to wait upon the Prince at the Palace, he was extremely surpris'd to see Lysonice's picture in her Chamber. This thought so wholly took up his mind, that though the Prince's arrival caus'd a sufficient noise in the Court of the Palace, he scarce heard it at all. Yet at length he went to meet him in the Court, and being the Prince lov'd him very well, and believ'd he stood in need of him, he caress'd and embrac'd him with tenderness. Let us forget what is pass'd, Cloraniſbes (said he to him) and make amends for it with the future; so that you may be never separated from my interests. Cloraniſbes very respectfully answer'd to that which the Prince said to him; who after that, fell to speak of the hunting and several indifferent matters. But some time after he was in his Chamber, he caus'd Cloraniſbes to enter into his Closet, where when he had discours'd very obligingly to him, and Cloraniſbes fully justifi'd himself, he told him that to restitute to him that he believ'd him innocent, he would presently put confidence in him, and impart to him his desires to bring Bosfar to his interests. I know he is mal-content with the King of Adassilia (said he to him) that he is courageous, his reputation amongst these Nations, and is master of a strong place; therefore you must endeavour to gain him to me, and oblige him to declare himself for me when I shall desire it. My Lord (answer'd Cloraniſbes, who was glad of this employment) I am sufficiently capable to bring to pass that which you desire; For Bosfar has some esteem for me. Then you must return secretly to him (added the Prince) but seeing it concerns me that this negotiation be neither tedious nor unsuccessful, I am to ask you, whether Bosfar's Daughter, whose Picture you have seen in my Chamber, be as handsome as it; for, if she be, you must tell Bosfar I am ready to marry her, on condition he will do what I desire. You know (added he) I have always set up my resolution never to marry a woman but who is admirably fair; therefore it behoves you to answer me punctually, and tell me whether Lysonice be like her picture: for I say again, if she be as handsome, I shall be glad that she be the means to unite Bosfar and me; seeing I never beheld any thing so handsome as this Picture, and I am in love with it.

Cloraniſbes was then extremely perplex'd; the love he had for Lysonice combated with his generosity, which urg'd him to tell a truth which might content the ambition of that fair person; but he had so little time to deliberate upon a thing most difficult to resolve upon, that Love being unable to consent that he should yield up his Mistress, and not daring to tell the Prince he was amorous of Lysonice, especially not being much lov'd by her, he told him, 'twas true, Lysonice was a great beauty, but in his own eye she came much short of her Picture. Perhaps (said the Prince to him) you have not well consider'd her; for banish't persons have usually so many other things to take up their minds, that their eyes may commit injustices. But however (added the Prince) it is requisite that you go to Bosfar, and treat with him, and consider Lysonice well: and then in case she be as handsome as her Picture, you may confidently assure Bosfar that I will marry her. If she be not, offer him a greater fortune in my Dominions than he has in that of the King his Master; and do not come back till this treaty be accomplish'd. Cloraniſbes being unable to contradict the Prince, accepted the employment, which he gave him, and prepar'd himself to depart the next day. But when he came to spend the evening with me, I saw him so afflicted that I pity'd him. I knew not what to think at first; for though the Prince accounted Lysonice's Picture very handsome, yet I was ignorant of his secret intention; so that I could do nothing but conjecture. I assure you (said I to Cloraniſbes) I never told the Prince that I had seen Lysonice, nor that you were in love with her, but it was your Painter's doing, who being ambitious to shew what he could do, caus'd her Picture to be seen by the Prince. Alas! my dear Amilcar (said he to me) I am unfortunate. After which exclamation he related to me what had befallen him. But (said I to him) you do not account that you need be so perplex'd; For if I were in your place, I would tell the Prince I was amorous of Lysonice; it not being credible that he is so much in love with her Picture as to contend for her with you. But you do not consider what you say (answer'd he) for the Prince has not only had always a fancy to marry the handsomest woman in the World, if he could, but he aims in this Marriage to bring Bosfar over to his interests; so that should I tell him of my love to Lysonice, he would look upon me as an obstacle to his design; and being I am not yet too well establish'd in his mind, I should ruine my self therein for ever; I should cause him to banish me a second time, and eternally deprive my self of the hope of pretending to Lysonice. But what then intend you to do? (said I.) Alas! my dear Amilcar (answer'd he) I know not; for, to examine things aright, I betray Lysonice as well as the Prince, by saying she is less handsome than her Picture, since nothing is more true than that her Picture is a thousand times less handsome than her self; and which is worst (added he) I am a wretch who love only my own felicity, who have no regard to Lysonice's advancement, who offer to keep her from that which of all things in the World most suits with her inclination, and who, having no assurance of being happy, go about to hinder her from being so, as without doubt she would be, if she became wife to the Prince of Carthage. For all this, I cannot overcome my passion, my generosity must yield to it, Lysonice must be injur'd because I love her, and because I cannot deprive my self of her; and though I am to betray both the Prince, Bostar and Lysonice, yet 'tis absolutely necessary that I lose not hope, and beware of being the instrument to put her into the arms of another, whose affection being only grounded on her beauty, would in a short time diminish. So that, when I consider well, 'tis for Lysonice's own sake that I must hinder her from becoming Princess of Carthage; or, at least I will persuade my self so. Cloranibes spoke this so pathetically, that he caus'd me to pity him. But again, (said I to him) What intend you to do? I intend (answer'd he) to employ all my power to invite Bostar into the interests of the Prince, without mentioning the Marriage of Lysonice; and if my negotiation prove happy, at my return I will give the Prince an account of it, and at last tell him that Lysonice is less handsome than her Picture. And being he does not know her, that fancy of his will vanish. But withal, to hinder Lysonice from convincing me of untruth, and appearing so soon at the Court, I will handsomly persuade Bostar to leave Cyrene and Lysonice in that important place which he holds, whither he would not go at first, for fear of rendring himself more suspected to the King of Massilia. But when all that you speak is done (said I to him) Lysonice will not be yours. No (answer'd he) but she will not be another's, and 'tis possible in process of time she may be mine.

I spoke many things more to Cloranibes, to which he answer'd as one prepossess'd by his passion. Nevertheless, he could take no very firm resolution, and the uncertainty which distracted him made his greatest torment. So he went away unresolv'd, and continu'd his journey in the same manner; and when he was arriv'd near Bostar's house, he was almost in the mind that his great affection might induce him to give over pretending to Lysonice, and to tell her ingenuously the truth. But when at his arrival he beheld her upon the Stone-stair-entrance, going to walk with Pasilia and Delisia, this sight destroy'd all his designs, and caus'd him to take an immovable resolution to do all he could to marry Lysonice. He had no sooner resolv'd thus, but he lookt upon matters in another manner; he believ'd there was no unfaithfulness in doing what he did, that he having lov'd Lysonice a long time, and the Prince loving but her Picture, he might innocently practise a deceit, and that provided he could engage Bostar in the interests of his Master, he was not Criminal in not mentioning his marriage with Lysonice. In effect, without amusing my self too long in telling you after what manner he acted, I shall only tell you, that he manag'd Bostar's mind so well, that he brought him to that which he desir'd, which was so much the more easily done, because he was advis'd the King of Massilia had resolv'd to destroy him: so Cloranibes almost intirely concluded the treaty with Bostar.

All this while Lysonice no longer considering Cloranibes as an Exile, but on the contrary as a man that might free her self from being such, treated him better than ordinary, suffer'd him to speak to her of his passion, and did not forbid him even to hope. This confirming Cloranibes in the resolution he had taken, he remain'd firm in it, and was more amorous than he had been; without doubt nothing serves more to augment love than hope.

At his return he was receiv'd very well by the Prince; especially when he inform'd him that his negotiation was successful. Yet he was sufficiently discontented when Cloranibes assur'd him too, that Lysonice was not so fair in his eyes as her Picture. Not but that she is handsome, my Lord (said he to him) but either I understand not your inclination, or I am perswaded her beauty would not affect you. For my part (added the Prince in a great indignation) I cannot sufficiently blame the weakness of women in general, who will always have their Pictures made handsomer than themselves, and will be more oblig'd to the Painter than Nature, without considering that it would be more pleasing for them to hear it said, that they are more handsome than their Pictures, than to perceive in the eyes of such as behold their Portraitsures, that they judge they have been flatter'd. Believe me (said I to the Prince; for I was present at this conversation) all the world desires to be flatter'd; people will have flattering Pictures, they admit of adulation with delight, they will be flatter'd even in their houses, and trifles; and I know a woman that has a little Dog who would take it very ill if she were not flatter'd in conceit of him; and who so would be her friend, must confidently affirm that 'tis the handsomest Dog in the world. Judge then, my Lord (added I) if thole women are not to be pardon'd who desire to have the appellation of plump, fair, and rose given them, to have arch'd eyes, little mouths, and fair hands, and handsome arms attributed to them, though they have none of all these: They must therefore be pardon'd a weakness which they cannot be hindred from (answer'd Cloranibes.) For my part (reply'd Cloranibes) I cannot pardon the Painter who has made the Picture of Lysonice handsomer than she is; for I should have extremely lov'd a woman as fair as that. But, in fine, since 'tis so, I must be satisfi'd, and to put it out of my mind (added he) I will have that deceitful Picture taken away. And accordingly he gave it to Cloranibes, who receiv'd it joyfully. However (added he) 'tis sufficient that your negotiation succeeds well.

The next day the Prince sent Cloranibes back again to Bostar; the Treaty was sign'd, and Bostar, not caring any longer for being suspected by the King of Massilia, went forthwith to that important place which belong'd to him with Cyrene, Lysonice, and the two Ladies his Kinswomen. The Prince of Carthage sent some men to him to strengthen his Garrison: at length the business became so much rumord, that it could not be doubted of. In the interim, Cloranibes increasing in favour, the favours of Lysonice were also augmented towards him; and according as he was consider'd by his Master, he was likewise by his Mistress, who at this time gave him all grounds to believe that she would obey without resistance, if Bostar commanded her to marry him. Cyrene greatly wish'd this Marriage; and Bostar himself desir'd it, both out of affection to Cloranibes, and to content Lysonice, who he knew did not dislike it, and more also out of Policy. But sometimes he wonder'd much, that Cloranibes, who he knew was passionately amorous of Lysonice, did not speak to him about it.

After divers matters which 'tis not necessary to tell you, because they relate only to the interests of the King of Massilia and the Prince of Carthage, Bostar came to Utica to confer with the Prince of Carthage, who was then a great Lover of a Lady of Quality in his Court; but he did not bring Cyrene nor Lysonice thither, who remain'd in the strong place. I told you of Cloranibes love being now very violent, and observing the Prince engag'd in an affection which agreeably employ'd him, he thought he might begin in good earnest to think of being happy. Wherefore he speaks in private to Boftar about his love to Lysonice, askt him, if he might hope to be happy, and conjures him to open his heart to him, as himself is resolv'd to open his own to him. Boftar approves his design, and tells him that he promises him his daughter: after which Cloranisbes gave him a thousand thanks. But, my Lord (said he to him) if you please to have me happy, it lies in your power to render me absolutely so; for I know the Prince of Carthage is of so nice and suspicious an humor, that if I should appear very amorous of Lysonice, I should be always suspected by him. If I should but express my self desirous to marry, he would less esteem me for it, and think me less addicted to his interests: therefore to accomplish my happiness, and keep him from believing me more devoted to you than to himself, it is requisite to act in such manner, that he may think I marry Lysonice only because he commands me to do it; and in fine, 'tis your part to bring him to command it. Though it be not the custom (answer'd Boftar) for a father to speak first of marrying his daughter, yet I have so earnest a desire to give you mine, that I will dispense with the ordinary decorum for your sake. And accordingly Boftar manag'd this affair with the Prince in such sort, that he oblig'd him to think fit of his own accord for him to marry Lysonice into his Court, to the end that important place which belong'd to him, might not after his death be possess'd by any person that depended on the King of Massilia. 'Tis for that reason, my Lord (said Boftar to the Prince) that I presume to desire a husband of you for Lysonice. The Prince judging this proposition of Boftar might be to his advantage, receiv'd it well, and set himself to think who would be a fit person in his Court to marry Lysonice. At first he cast his eyes towards me; but a moment after remembring how great an enemy I was to marriage, he diverted his thoughts to several others, but he found some obstacles in all: at length he thought of Cloranisbes, and nevertheless he durst not name him to Boftar, because remembring in what manner he had heard him speak of Lysonice, he fear'd he might have some aversion against her. Whereof being desirous to be satisfied, he only told Boftar that he would think upon it. As soon as night was come, the Prince speaking in private to Cloranisbes, propounded the business to him with all the Reasons which political interest suggested to him, to perswade him to marry Lysonice. Nor that I will compel you to it (said he) if you have any aversion for her; but if she be indifferent to you, undoubtedly you can do nothing more advantageous for your self, nor important for me; for you are not ignorant of what importance the place is which belongs to Boftar, and which will be yours after his death. Cloranisbes heard this which the Prince said to him, with a joy so great, that he had some difficulty to dissemble it. Yet he was so much Master of himself, that he receiv'd this Proposal like a man averse to marry, and who would not resolve upon it, but only because it was the prince's pleasure; who therefore thank'd him for the consent he gave to it.

Now the Prince being us'd to proceed hastily in all things which he undertakes, the next morning he told Boftar he had found a husband for Lysonice, and then nam'd Cloranisbes to him, who was accepted as you may imagine. Wherefore being impatient till the business were accomplish'd, it was resolv'd Cloranisbes should return with Boftar to marry Lysonice. At first the Prince would have had Lysonice have come to Utica; but Cloranisbes representing to him that there was danger in leaving the plate so long without the presence of Boftar, Cyrene, and Lysonice, he at length determin'd that it was best for Cloranisbes to go a long with Boftar thither; and the Prince told me, that to render the feast more delightful, he would permit me to go to the Nuptials. You may judge how joyful Cloranisbes was; for in the transports of his contentment, he foresaw nothing but delight and happiness for all the remainder of his life. Lysonice had treated him well the last time he saw her; her ambition had wherewith to be contented, as well as her love; Boftar and Cyrene lov'd him; and the Prince being amorous of another at this time, he did not think there was any thing to be fear'd. So then he studied only how to give Lysonice every thing which he imagin'd might please her. Knowing the affected magnificence, there was no piece of State in Carthage that might bestir her; but he gave it her; and procur'd her such a handsome retinue, that nothing could be desir'd more. But, in fine, we departed with Boftar, and went to find Cyrene and Lysonice, who having been advertis'd of the state of matters, receiv'd us admirably well. Lysonice, having heard the Prince of Carthage's Court many times spoken of as a very gallant Court, was extremely joyful to think that she should be in a very considerable rank there; seeing she should marry a man whom the Prince lov'd very well, and whose merit made him worthy of the love of all the world. Cloranisbes observing her so well satisfi'd, was the happiest man in the world; as without doubt there is nothing more sweet in love, than to cause the felicity of a person whom we love. And indeed I never saw a person have a more real joy than that which Cloranisbes had; for though there was some deceit in his proceeding, yet Love render'd it excusable, and his passion was too ardent then to suffer him to be capable of repenting. But because he was wholly taken up with entertaining his Mistress and his own joys, he desir'd me to take some care for the magnificence of the Feast. Wherefore searching in my memory all the gallantries which I had seen in my travels, I may say, I contributed something to the divertisement of the Marriage. I omit to tell you that Boftar made continual feasting for three days, that there were publick sports, and several exercises, for which Lysonice gave the prize, that on the Feast-day there was a very gallant Ball; but I shall only tell you, that the next day, because all the Africans are exquisite Dancers, we made a kind of a Masque, which I had devis'd, wherein Pasilia, Delisia, and some other Ladies danc'd; and it was receiv'd not without some applause.

Though we were not at the Marriage (said Plotina interrupting him) do not think but we will be at the Masque, and you shall not escape without telling us something of it.

If I could remember the Verses (answer'd Amilcar) I would tell you them with pleasure, but they were made in such haste, that I did not think them worthy of retaining. The unpremeditated Poetry of Amilcar (said Valeria) excels the most elaborate of others. However (said Plotina) tell us the Subject and Order of the Masque, and at least some of the Verses. I will, Madam, (answer'd he) but first, I must tell you, that I devis'd it, that being the persons there were partly of the Court, and partly of the Country, I feign'd that there were two Cupids, one which might be nam'd the Cupid of the Court, and the other the Country-Cupid. And therefore I intitl'd our Masque

The different Effects of LOVE.

THe Castle wherein we were, having a large Hall, I caus'd a great Theatre to be erected in it from side to side. One end of it was adorn'd with the representation of stately Palaces, and the other with an agreeable Landskip. On the right side of the Theatre appear'd first the Cupid of the Court with a Bow painted and gilded, a Quiver of the same, adorn'd with Jewels, his Wings painted and gilded, a Torch in his hand, and follow'd by Jealousie, Disimulation, Fear and Fury.

On the other side of the Theatre appear'd the Country-Cupid with a Bow and a Quiver adorn'd with flowers, follow'd by Hope, Laughter, Sports, Pleasures, and Jealousie, which appear'd not so frightful as the other, and was accompani'd only with light fears and suspicions which I had represented pleasantly enough.

Then either of these Cupids made a Speech, in which they related their power. After which desying one another to give proofs of it, they danc'd together in a threatening manner.

After this, the Entries were diversifi'd, namely, there was one of the Cupid of the Court, and another of the Cupid of the Country, with a different sort of Musick agreeing to either of them: of which I am going to give you as good a relation as my memory will permit me.

But to the end the several Entries might not be confounded, the two Cupids always appear'd there alternately, shewing the effects which they pretended to have caus'd.

The first Entry of the Cupid of the Court, was a King in Love with a Young Shepherdess; and the first of the Cupid of the Country, was a Young Shepherd coming out of a poor Cottage, proper, jovial, spruce, active at all sorts of exercises, though he had been taught the same only by Love.

The second Entry of the Cupid of the Court was an old Miser, offering all his Treasure to a Young Mistress, who laugh'd at him as she took them: and the second Entry of the Country Cupid was a Young Shepherd, who giving his Shepherdess but a Shephook engraven with the Letters of her name, was receiv'd by him with a thousand carresses.

The third Entry of the Cupid of the Court, was three jealous and ill-us'd Lovers, fighting together in the presence of their Mistress who laugh'd at them; and the third Entry of the Country Cupid was two Shepherds, who singing the best they could before their mistress, had an innocent contest together, of which her heart was the subject.

The fourth Entry of the Cupid of the Court was a foolish Gossip, delivering Letters, Bracelets of Hair and Pictures to four Lovers, without their perceiving it, with which she made her self pleasant with an old friend of hers: and the fourth Entry of the Country Cupid was a young Shepherdess, who having a Sheep of her Flock stray'd away, carefully sought for it, and afterwards receiv'd it from the hand of her Shepherd who brought it back to her, after he had slain a Wolf that would have prey'd upon it.

The fifth Entry of the Cupid of the Court was a Young Lacedemonian virgin, follow'd by four Athenians, who requir'd their hearts again of her, intimating thereby that the hatred of Nations does not hinder but love may arise between persons that are enemies: and the fifth Entry of the Country Cupid, was a Young Shepherdess, looking upon three Young Shepherds who strove for the prize of a race: the first running very swiftly without regarding her, arriv'd at the Goal before the rest; the second turning his head to see her, was cast behind; and the third not being able to pass further, stay'd just before her; after which the Young Shepherdess gave a Garland of Flowers to those that had run best, but she gave her heart to the third: at which the others were so discontented, that they went away in great despair.

The last Entry of the Cupid of the Court was men and women of quality, who having danc'd a while, stood in order to hear a Sonnet sung by Youth, which was admirably well represented, and in few words spoke a thousand things in praise of the Cupid of the Court, to whom alone belong'd gallantry, magnificence, and liberality: and the sixth and last Entry of the Country Cupid was several Shepherds and Shepherdesses, who danc'd to Songs under Trees, alternately, answering one another. That which they sung was a kind of Dialogue, in which I made a little merry Satyre against the Cupid of the Court, and an Elegium in favour of the innocence of the Country Cupid. After which those of the Court and the Shepherds uniting, and there appearing but one Cupid, who represented something of both the other which had been seen, they acknowledg'd one another, and ended the Mask with a Speech, which concluded, to the honour of Love, and in the name of all those that had appear'd.

*Come then and let's adore
At Courts and pleasant Springs,
This lovely Conqueror
Of Shepherds and of Kings.
Unhappy he whose heart
Receives not Cupid's wound, Without the torments of his Darts,
No pleasure's to be found.*

How? (said Platina.) do you think you shall not tell us some of the Verses of the Mask? In good earnest, Madam (answer'd Amilcar.) I have the greatest desire in the World to do it, but it does not please my memory; and all that I can do, is only to tell you the four Verses which I made for that young Lacedemonian Virgin who was follow'd by the four Athenians, which requir'd their hearts again of her: yet they did not serve, and I was forc'd to make others, because I had Greece so much in my head when I made them, that I did not remember I was in Africa. But they were these.

*Why, unjust enemies, do you accuse me?
I've stoln a hundred hearts (so Love refuse me!)
But how can any dwell in Greece not know,
My Country Sparta's Laws do theft allow?*

No doubt you will say I have studied very deeply; and add that I have an odde memory; but since I know not how to do otherwise, 'tis better that you do not interrupt me, but suffer me to finish my story. I will not detain you with exaggerating Clorinde's joy; for for it was great beyond the possibility of expression. Doffar also was highly contented, Cyrus was extremely satisfied; Pasilla and Delisa, hoping to go to the Court with their Kinswoman, were ravish'd with joy; and Lysonice having married a very worthy person that lov'd her ardently, and who she believ'd would shortly carry her to Utica, seem'd as contented as any one in the World. Soon after I was recall'd by the Prince, and oblig'd to leave Clorambes with the fair Lysonice. At my taking leave of him, he desir'd me to speak as little as I could of Lysonice when I should be with the Prince, and only to say by the by that her beauty was much improv'd since I had seen her first; but above all, to beware of discovering that he was amorous of her: and accordingly I did as he desir'd, and that with sufficient address. So being oblig'd by the Prince to come away about some affairs of his, I departed as you have known, and left things in that condition.

But I have understood by a Friend of Clorambes whom he has sent to me, that the face of things is since much alter'd. For fifteen days after his Nuptials the Prince recall'd him to Utica. Lysonice was desirous to accompany her Husband; but for that he was loth the Prince should see her so soon, he told her, that having as yet no house there fit for her accommodation, it was more requisite for himself to go alone to make preparations; chusing rather to part for some time from the person whom he lov'd, than to venture to have her seen by the Prince so soon after his marriage; for he found that he had not sufficient power over himself to hide his passion for Lysonice, if they should be seen together at Utica. Besides, it is always natural enough to defer a thing which we fear, as much as possibly we can. So he left Lysonice, and promis'd her that he would return to her with all speed. At his coming to the Court, he found the Prince had broken off with his Mistress, was very much offended with her, likely never to love her more. Whereupon Clorambes us'd all the industry and address he could to re-engage him, that so having his mind prepossess'd, he might take less notice of Lysonice's beauty when he should see her: but he could effect nothing. In the interim he writ every day to his dear Lysonice, he sent her Presents continually, and not having ceas'd to be a Lover by becoming a Husband, there was no care which he did not use to please her: he went to see her several times; and as often as he saw her, he found out new impediments of her journey to Utica. One time he said his house was not ready; another, that it was requisite to expect till the Princess of Carthage were reconcil'd with her brother; another, that winter was not a healthful season wherein to go and reside at Utica: so that, though Lysonice accounted the time very long, yet she did not disbelieve what Clorambes told her, but hop'd that at least in the Spring she should go to Court. The Winter-time was thus pass'd over, but Spring being come, Clorambes found himself sufficiently perplex'd; for Lysonice knowing he had a house in the Country within half a days journey of Utica, she ask'd him to permit her at least to go thither for a month: Which not daring to refuse her, and judging also that it would be more convenient for him to go and see her there than elsewhere, he consented to. So Lysonice went to that place, and Pasilla and Delisa with her: but as soon as it was known at Utica that she was there, several persons went to visit her, Clorambes with all his address being unable to hinder them. Wherefore, seeing Lysonice has one of those surprising beauties, which such as behold the first time cannot refrain from speaking of, all that saw her, highly cry'd her up at their return to Utica, and rais'd such a report of her, that the Prince of Carthage hearing how exceedingly she was exalt'd, was surpris'd at it, calling to mind what Clorambes had answer'd him, when he shew'd him Lysonice's picture. Which sticking much in his thoughts, he ask'd one of those that had seen Lysonice whether he remembred to have sometimes seen a picture of her in his Chamber. Yes, my Lord (said that man, who knew nothing of what had pass'd between the Prince and Clorambes) but I can assure you without fallhood, that Lysonice is a thousand times handsomer than that picture. But are you well assur'd of what you say? (reply'd the Prince) It will be easie for you, my Lord (answer'd the man) to be satisfi'd of it; for 'tis unlikely that Lysonice will never come to Utica. After this the Prince seem'd sufficiently pensive, for coming to consider that Clorambes did not cause his wife to come to Court, and that he had seen her while he was in banishment, he began to suspect that he might have told him an untruth; wherefore being desirous to know the certainty, and to be resolv'd by his own eyes, he purpos'd to go a hunting towards the side where Lysonice's house was, without letting Clorambes know of it, to the end he might not remove her. And indeed the Prince us'd so much care to hide his intention, that Clorambes was not advertis'd of it till the Prince was on horse-back for the hunting match. This put him to a great perplexity: nevertheless he conceal'd his disturbance, and went to the hunting with the rest. He seem'd also a more forward Hunter than any of those that follow'd the Prince; and whereas 'tis easie to turn out of the way in a chase, without any notice to be taken of it, Clorambes, who knew the shortest and most unfrequented passages to go from Utica to his House, separated from the rest in a Wood, and putting his Horse on a full speed, went with incredible diligence to find Lysonice, who was but beginning to dress her Head; and who in the tediousness of solitude did not much mind adorning her self. When she saw Clorambes arrive in such apparent haste, she ask'd him what the matter was; and how it hapn'd that he arriv'd so early: For you must needs have set forth very betimes in the morning (added she) or else you have travel'd very fast. I have done both (answer'd he) and the cause of my coming in such haste, is, for that I believe the Prince will come hither at the end of the chase. Lysonice being very glad of this news, bid her women advertise Pasilla and Delisa of it; after which, turning her self towards Clorambes, You have much oblig'd me (said she to him) in giving me this notice: for otherwise, the Prince would have found me in a negligent dress which would have sham'd you. Go then (added she) and give order to your people to make some handsome preparations for entertaining the Prince; and in the mean time (contin'd she smiling) I will go and dress myself to the best advantage I can, to the end to do you honour. I beseech you Madam (said he to her) enter into your Closet a moment, that I may speak with you there. Lysonice not being able to conjecture what Clorambes had to say to her, arise up; and did as he desir'd: She was no sooner enter'd into her Closet, but Clorambes looking upon her with very much love and sadness together, I beseech you, my dear Lysonice (said he to her) do not refuse me a request I have to make to you; and when you have granted it me, never never ask me wherefore I made it. Since what you say to me (answer'd she) signifies some diffidence, you must permit me to be a little surpris'd. However, speak, if you please, what you desire of me. I wish (said he to her) that, if you will oblige me, you would feign your self sick to day, and instead of adorning your self, as you intend, be as carelessly attir'd as you can; let the Curtains of your Windows be drawn, let the Pillows of your Bed be depress'd, and finally, let there be so little day in your Chamber that the Prince may not yet know that I am the most happy of all men. How? my Lord, (interrupted Lysonice, blushing with anger) is the solitude then in which I am, an effect of so strange a jealousy, as renders you capable of the most outrageous caution that ever was? What? my Lord (added she again) do you believe that if I should excite love in the Prince, it would be easie for him to excite the like in me, now I am your Wife? I confess indeed (contin'd this offended Fair) that being naturally ambitious, if he had lov'd me heretofore, he might have been not ill-treated, even though he were not so worthy a person as he is; but as things are now, you do me an injury which cannot be repair'd. Alas! charming Lysonice (said he to her) I beseech you do not condemn me so lightly. I swear to you I am not jealous; 'tis ambition alone which causes me to act thus, and 'tis only for your sake that I make you a request which seems so unreasonable to you. But grant me, if it be possible, that which I desire of you, without obliging me to tell you the reason which forces me to it; and go not to imagine that I suspect your virtue, or out of a sentiment of jealousy fear, lest the Prince should excite love in you. That which I do has another cause, I swear to you with all the sincerity which I am capable. No, no, my Lord (reply'd she) you can have no other sentiment in your soul, but jealousy, and I see well (added she with tears in her eyes) that I am only to prepare my self to be the most unhappy person in the world. For what means is there to cure a jealousy which foresees the future so far off? and how can such an injury as this be forgotten? I have in a manner seen nothing but Trees since I was your Wife (proceeded she in great passion) I have heard nothing but Birds, and convers'd with none but Paslia, Delissa and your self; and yet, I see, this does not hinder you from being jealous. I protest to you once again, Madam (said he to her) I am not jealous. But if you are not (answer'd she) tell me then the reason which obliges you to make me so strange a request. The fear of being less lov'd by you Madam (reply'd he) is the sole cause which hinders me from telling you that which you desire. I assure you (said she) this motion of yours is so strange, that you can tell me nothing which is more; and my mind is so disturb'd with the ill-grounded suspicion you have of my virtue, that I think this injury will never be obliterated out of it. Then Cloransibes seeing Lysonice was extremely incens'd, resolv'd of a sudden to tell her the truth, though he fear'd she would possibly hate him for having hinder'd her from being Princess of Carthage. Nevertheless, he had liv'd so well with her, he was in a dignity so considerable, and she liv'd so well with him that he hop'd it might be advantageous to him to tell her the proceeding he had us'd to attain her. So having made a thousand protestations to her, of a serious affection, he began to tell her, that he had given her a testimony of love which she knew not of, and for which withal, he fear'd she would not thank him. After which he ingenuously confess his whole proceeding to her, as it was done, and so let her know that the love he had for her, had oblig'd him to tell the Prince she was not so handsome as her Picture and consequently to hinder her from marrying. Cloransibes told her this with all the art imaginable: but after all, Lysonice knew very well, that had it not been for him, she had been Princess of Carthage; whereupon she could not keep her self from seeming surpris'd and changing colour. Which Cloransibes observing, Well, Madam (said he to her) had I not reason to be unwilling to tell you the truth? but I beseech you, consider every thing thoroughly which may render me excusable to you. The sole excess of my passion caus'd me to betray the Prince, and the sole excess of my passion has oblig'd me to make the request to you which I have done. For, in fine, if the Prince see you with all your charms, in the condition wherein I know his mind is to day, he will perhaps banish me, and then you will be the Wife of an unfortunate exile, which is certainly the thing you fear most in the World. For my part, I declare to you, if you were of another humor, I should glory in being banish'd with you, and be so far from entreating you to hide your beauty, that I should desire you to make it more conspicuous with all that Art can add to Nature, to the end to be rather banish'd and go live in some agreeable Desert, where you would be instead of all things to me, and where I should account my self happy with you alone. But on the contrary, Madam, your inclination leading you to love the world, and being unwilling to restrain it, I conjure to you appear neglectedly this day in the eyes of the Prince, and defer making your self seen with all your charms, till his Love be settled upon some Lady; for when he is amorous, he is prejudic'd against the beauty of all other women. By this means he may see you without knowing that I have betray'd him; and after this, you shall come to Utica, and live there as you please. In the mean time pardon me, my dear Lysonice, the Treason I have committed against you, be contented to reign absolutely in my heart, and consider that if I had not lov'd you, I had not debar'd you of a glory which you deserve. Being you have much wit, my Lord (answer'd she) you turn things as you please. Not but that, what you have done in this occasion (added she) has been the act of a self-interested, and not at all of a generous Lover; for if you had acted nobly, you should first have told me the truth, and afterwards endeavour'd to perswade me to prefer you before the Prince; but, in fine, let us leave what is past as it is, it being always fruitless to speak of it; but for the present know, I do not cease to believe, after all which you have said, that the request you have made to me is sufficiently injurious.

As Cloransibes was going to answer, one came to tell him that a great many Hunters appear'd in the Plain; so that believing it was the Prince, being unwilling he should find him at home, he was constrain'd to leave Lysonice in haste, and go forth at a back-door. But before he left her, he said several very passionate things to her, whereto she gave no direct answer. After which getting upon his Horse, he went to fetch a great compass, to come and overtake the Prince, who was not so near as Cloransibes servants had believ'd; because by thinking to take a shorter way, he lost himself in a Wood. In the mean time Lysonice who is naturally ambitious, could not hinder her self from having a secret anger for the testimony of Love Cloranes had render'd her; although she had no design to be reveng'd on him for it in a Criminal way: but she could never resolve to counterfeit her self sick, and appear carelessly dress'd. On the contrary, believing that when the Prince had seen her, she should afterwards go to the Court, she lik'd better that he should see her on a sudden, than defer it longer; and as nothing is more repugnant to a handsome person than to shew her self after a manner disadvantageous to her beauty, Lysonice attir'd her self as well as she was accusom'd, and something better too; though as I said, she had no intention to excite love in the Prince, but only to despise Cloranes, and to be afterwards at liberty to live at Court. After she was dress'd, Pasilia and Delisa who had adorn'd themselves too, came to her, and were much surpris'd to observe that she had some kind of commotion mix'd with anger in her eyes, which denoted to them that she was troubled. So that demanding the cause of her, she told it them with a certain air, which gave them to understand that ambition was always her predominant passion. A little while after, the sound of hunting instruments was heard, which signifi'd the approaching arrival of the Prince. And presently Lysonice beheld a body of persons of Quality, a great number of slaves, and a very magnificent equipage enter into the Court. But this pomp rather afflicted than pleas'd her, out of the thought that Cloranes had hinder'd her from being wife to the Prince for whom this magnificence was.

In the mean time Cloranes having fetcht a great turn, had overtaken the Prince of Carthage, without his suspecting that he had been at his house; and to act the more cunningly, he made as if he had not known that the Prince intended to go see Lysonice. So that addressing to him, If I had known, my Lord (said he to him) that you intended to hunt on this side, I should have order'd Lysonice to have caus'd a Collation to be prepar'd for you at the end of the Chase; but I conceiv'd it was not fit to dare to propound to you to go to a place where you are not expected. Persons of my condition (said the Prince) are so accusom'd to be expected, that sometimes they delight to go where they are not; and therefore since I am so near your house, I will go see Lysonice. Being she writ to me yesterday that she was a little indispos'd (reply'd Cloranes, believing his wife would do as he had desir'd her) I know not whether she will be in a condition to receive the honour which you intend to do her. We shall see that presently (answer'd the Prince) for the hunting does not pleasure me so well to day, as that I have any mind to continue it longer. And so taking the shortest way, the Prince being preceded or follow'd by all his Attendants, went to Cloranes's house, which was not inferior to that wherein he first saw Lysonice. But in entering into the second Court, Cloranes was much surpris'd to see Lysonice upon the Stone-stairs of the entrance, accompani'd with Pasilia and Delisa, and to see her there in an attire, which though it had little shew of the Country negligence, was nevertheless graceful and magnificent; for he knew thereby that her mind was much exasperated: yet he disssembled his thoughts at that time. But for that Lysonice was handsomer in the open day than in the shadow, the Prince of Carthage and all his followers were so surpris'd with the rare lustre of her beauty, that they could not contain from testifying their admiration. The Prince of Carthage who was alighted from his horse, as soon as he perceiv'd Lysonice, went towards her with precipitation, and saluted her with a civility which signifi'd to her that he accounted her admirably handsome; for he had almost omitted to salute Pasilia and Delisa, though they were very amiable. I am more oblig'd to Cloranes than I thought, Madam (said the Prince to Lysonice) for his constant residence with me; for being so fair a person as I see you are, it would be more acceptable for him to be with you. The pleasure of doing a duty is so great (answer'd she) that 'tis not much to be wonder'd, my Lord, if Cloranes prefer you before me. 'Tis a pleasure (reply'd the Prince sufficient roughly) which perhaps he has not always so much lov'd. After this, being enter'd into the Hall, the conversation of the Prince with Lysonice continu'd. The Persons of Quality that accompani'd him discours'd amongst themselves, or with Pasilia and Delisa: and Cloranes being in a strange perplexity, spoke sometimes to one and sometimes to another; for his mind was incens'd with Lysonice's proceedings, he fear'd lest the Prince should discover the truth, and he apprehended above all things that Lysonice would love him no more, and that she could not pardon him the deceit his passion had caus'd him to commit. In the mean time the Prince of Carthage finding Lysonice every moment more handsome, could not contain from expressing part of what he thought. For my part (said he to her) I confess I do not understand wherefore Cloranes has not told me a thousand times of his happiness, and why he hath not continually discours'd to me of you. 'Tis no doubt (answer'd she coldly) because a husband scarce ever speaks pertinently of his wife. But before he had married you (reply'd the Prince) he spoke to me as little of you; but on the contrary he declin'd speaking of you, and moreover affirm'd to me that a Picture which I had of you, was a flattering picture. Nevertheless, I see at present that he went far from the truth in speaking so. For my part, my Lord (answer'd Lysonice blushing with indignation) I so little know myself, that I know not whether Cloranes had not reason: but I conceive well, he would have done more obligingly for me, by suffering you to believe that I was as handsome as my picture. I agree with you, Madam (reply'd he) and I think moreover he would have more oblig'd me than you by not opposing my admiration. But to repair the injury that I did your beauty, by believing your picture handsomer than your self, I will this day begin to admire you anew, and to publish that there is no beauty in the world comparable to yours, Lysonice hereupon so modestly declin'd the praises which the Prince gave her, that she appear'd thereby the more charming. And then she acted with such address, that she drew Pasilia and Delisa into their conversation, which by degrees became altogether general.

After thus the Prince with his Company went to walk, and at his return he found a stately Collation, though there was but a very short time to prepare it; and then began the discourse to be about hunting, gaming, and other diversions. The Prince told Cloranes aloud, that it was not just to leave Lysonice so long in the Country, that she was too fit for the world to live in solitude; and that it was requisite to cause her to go speedily to Court. Cloranes being unwilling to pass for a jealous husband, answer'd that Lysonice was Mistress of her own actions, and might do what pleas'd her self. I have all my life so little known by experience (reply'd she) what it is to do ones own will, that I know not whether I ought to begin to learn, for fear if I did it once I should desire to do it all my life. Not that I accuse Cloranishes (added she) but all women in general are expos'd to this unhappiness, and a part of their virtue consists ordinarily in having no other will but theirs to whom the Law of Morality subjects them. 'Tis true (said Pasilia) we are born under the necessity to obey almost always, and never to command. On the contrary (answer'd the Prince) all obey beauty, and it belongs only to Ladies to command, Men request all their lives, and never command. In truth, my Lord (reply'd Delisia) I know not whether they request or command, but I know well they ordinarily do what they please. In effect (added Lysonice) as soon as young persons cease to learn to read, they begin to have so good opinion of themselves, as to think they are more able than their Masters, more deserving than their Fathers, and more wise than the Law : and as for their Mistresses, I assure you, they know not very well how to obey them, they love them for their own sakes only, they seek their own interest, without caring for the persons whom they love ; and in fine they always do whatever is agreeable to their own humor, without considering the will of another. While Lysonice was speaking thus, Cloranishes was gone to shew a Kinsman of the Prince a very handsome Horse which he had a desire to, so that Lysonice spoke with liberty of the subjection of women. Not that I speak out of discontent (continu'd she) because I desire many things which I do not ; but only because there is indeed some kind of injustice in being eternally servile. I account this Law as hard as you do (answer'd Pasilia) but I confess to the shame of my Sex, women many times use liberty so ill when it is allow'd them intirely, that the folly of some excuses in some sort the servitude of all the rest. For I know a woman in Massilia who has done a hundred extravagancies in her life, which she would not have committed if she had not had a too indulgent Husband. Ha ! Pasilia (reply'd Delisia) there was never any that could be call'd so. For my part (said the Prince smiling) I believe a handsome woman can never have one too indulgent. And for my part (said Pasilia) I conceive a Gossip and a young imprudent woman can never have one too severe. Yet 'tis a strange thing (said the Prince) for a husband to guard his wife. 'Tis a stranger (answer'd Pasilia) to see a man voluntarily shut his eyes that he may not see how many gallants his wife has that follow her, write to her, shew her Letters ; boast of her favours, and laugh both at her and him. But what should an honest man do (reply'd Delisia) when he is so unhappy as to have a wife who has no true virtue nor government of her self ? for I do not account those wives virtuous, who because they are not absolutely criminal, make no scruple of beginning several Gallantries which expose them to slander, and cause them to commit a thousand follies which render them despis'd even by them for whose sakes they do them. You have reason (answer'd Lysonice) not to put the less criminal Gossips in the rank of women indued with virtue ; for certainly if they be not the most culpable of all, they are always the most foolish. I am of your mind (reply'd Delisia) but however what must a poor Husband do, who is so unhappy as to have a wife of this humor ? If my judgment may pass (answer'd the Prince) he shall take his pleasure on his own side as well as he can, and see nothing but what he is willing to see. And if my judgment may pass (reply'd Pasilia) a husband that has such a kind of wife, must flatter her for some time, he must endeavour to win her by sweetness, reason, and address, to procure her virtuous Friends of her own Sex, to see that she have not a slave to wait upon her that is not virtuous, to cause her to love innocent pleasures ; and lastly, to cause her at least in some sort to fear him, if she cannot love him. If all this prove ineffectual, I allow him to act like a Master, to regulate the visits which she gives and receives, and send her too into the Country. For, in fine, I will not have a husband peaceably endure his wife to be a Gossip. But is there any thing which seems more strange (said the Prince) than a jealous husband ? people laugh at him and flout him, and say that by being jealous, he almost deserves to have his wife a Gossip. A jealous Sot (answer'd Pasilia) is certainly a sottish thing ; but a gallant prudent man ought not to be lookt upon as one that is jealous. On the contrary he is to be pitied and esteem'd : but as for one that is of a jealous nature, who persecutes an innocent wife without cause or colour, I consent that he be derided for it, and that whatever may augment his jealousy be wish'd to befall him. Were you desirous to be married speedily at Utica (reply'd Lysonice smiling) you could not speak better than you do, to give a good opinion of your self.

After this, because it was sufficiently late, the Prince retir'd, but so surpris'd and so charm'd with Lysonice, that he could not refrain from expressing how amiable he judg'd her. At parting, he askt her, whether she would not come shortly to Utica, and omitted to tell her nothing which he thought requisite to testify to her that she pleas'd him infinitely. Cloranishes having been call'd by the Prince, could not speak to Lysonice ; besides, loving her so much as he did, and the deceit his love had made him guilty of being discover'd to her, he knew not very well what to say to her ; for how dissatisfied soever he was, he was loth to make any sharp complaint, and so he left her without speaking to her.

The Prince of Carthage was so pensive all the way as he return'd, that he scarce spoke twenty words till he arriv'd at Utica. But when he was there, and beheld Cloranishes alone with him, he lookt stedfastly upon him, and speaking to him, Confess the truth, Cloranishes (said he to him) when I shew'd you Lysonice's Picture one day, you told me it was handsomer than she, only because you accounted her the handsomest person in the world ? I acknowledge it ingenuously, my Lord (answer'd he) but if I would I could maintain to you, that I accounted Lysonice less handsome than her Picture ; for none could convince me of an untruth ; since we see every day, that which pleases one, displeases another, and opinions are different upon all sorts of things. Ha ! Cloranishes (reply'd the Prince) that may be in mean beauties, but Lysonice is not of this rank, and no person in the world can pretend to have seen any thing, or conceive that a Painter could make a Picture so handsome as she : and this was the reason (added he) that you would have her be yours and not mine. It was not, my Lord (answer'd Cloranishes) because Lysonice was fair, that I fail'd in my duty, but only because I desperately lov'd her. I understand it so (reply'd the Prince) but if it be true that you betray'd me because you lov'd her, it is also true that you lov'd her because she was handsome. However it be, my Lord (answer'd Cloraniſbes) I did not fail in my duty without reluctance, and I account my ſelf ſo unhappy in having been Criminal againſt you, that the thought of it diſturbs part of my felicity. Being what is paſſ'd cannot be recall'd (ſaid the Prince) let us ſpeak no more of it. But for that it is not juſt for Lyſonice to ſuffer for your ſake, cauſe her to come to Court, and do not keep her longer in a ſolitude, which no queſtion is tedious to her. Cloraniſbes then ſpoke all he thought conducive to excuſe himſelf with the Prince, who accordingly made ſemblance of being ſatisfied with him. So that Cloraniſbes was now almoſt glad that the buſineſs was over thus; to the end he might be no longer oblig'd to cauſe Lyſonice to ſtay in the Country. Yet he was much diſcontented that ſhe had refus'd to be careleſſly dreſſ'd that day; however believing ſhe had done ſo out of deſpight which had ſomething of noble in it, he ſought to appeaſe himſelf. But ſo did not Lyſonice; for having ſeen the Prince, all that great equipage of hunting, and all his Court, ambition reviv'd in her heart; and ſhe was ſo far from conſidering what Cloraniſbes had done as a teſtimony of his love, that ſhe judg'd it as a weakneſs of his paſſion, and an injurious fact. Yet Paſſia and Deſiſa did all they could to temper her mind; but all they could obtain was, that ſhe would conſtrain her ſelf as much as ſhe could from teſtifying further reſentment to Cloraniſbes. For, in fine, (ſaid Paſſia to her) that which is paſſ'd cannot be recall'd; and moreover after all, you are wife of a very worthy man, who loves you dearly, and who being belov'd by the Prince, holds one of the firſt ranks in the Court. I confeſs (answer'd Lyſonice) but if I am not deceiv'd, he will not hold it long; and if the art of conjectures be not abſolutely falſe, I am expos'd to many infelicities. Yet I am reſolv'd (added ſhe) to ſupport them with the greateſt conſtancy I can, and to do nothing which may cauſe me to deſerve the miſfortunes which I foreſee will befall me. Theſe were the ſentiments of Lyſonice.

Cloraniſbes who always lov'd her with the higheſt ardor, and who would not be accounted jealous neither by her, nor the Prince, nor the Court, writ to her the next day to tell her that he deſir'd her to come to Utica, without taking any notice of that which ſhe had deny'd him. This motion ſufficiently pleas'd Lyſonice, who reſolv'd without ſcruple to obey Cloraniſbes. So ſhe joyfully left her Deſart, and went to Utica accompanied with her two amiable Kinſwomen. Aſſoon as ſhe arriv'd there, ſhe was viſited by the Prince, all the men of Quality, and all the Ladies; and her beauty was ſo cry'd up in the Court, that ſcarce any thing elſe was ſpoken of. The moſt eminent Beauties willingly yielded to her, and confeſs'd that nothing could equal the charms of Lyſonice. This fair perſon much affecting the world, ſhe was at firſt ſo glad of being there, that ſhe forgot part of her diſcontent. Not but that as often as ſhe ſaw the Prince, or beheld only his Palace or Windows, ſome diſpleaſing thoughts aroſe in her mind.

But now the preſence of Lyſonice, and the deſire to pleaſe her, occaſion'd the making of ſeveral appointments for diverſement in the Court. Cloraniſbes had made indeed ſome obliging reproaches to Lyſonice for having refus'd to do as he had deſir'd her: but being he ſtill lov'd her ardently, this little anger was eaſily appeas'd. But if Cloraniſbes was in quiet, the Prince of Carthage was not; for though he had a great deareneſs for Cloraniſbes, yet after he had ſeen Lyſonice, it came of a ſudden to decreaſe, and ſhortly to be wholly extinguiſh'd. But which was moſt cruel, at the rate of friendſhip diminſh'd in his heart towards Cloraniſbes, love augmented for Lyſonice, and he became ſo amorous of her, that he had not a moment of reſt. He would have oppos'd his paſſion with a ſentiment of generoſity in the beginning, and of friendſhip too for Cloraniſbes; and to fortifie himſelf to that purpoſe, he diſcover'd his ſecret to him that is come hither to find me, whoſe name is Anherbal, and told him that he was the moſt unhappy of all men. For, in fine, (ſaid he to him) I love a perſon, who I know well would have lov'd me out of ambition, if Cloraniſbes had not betray'd me, and who perhaps now out of honour will never love me. But, my Lord (answer'd he to whom he entrusted the ſecret of his heart) would you have been ſatisfied with it, if Lyſonice had lov'd you only out of an ambitious ſentiment? Believe me (reply'd the Prince) it matters not much to a Lover out of what ſentiments he is lov'd, provided he be ſo; nor ought he much to care whether it be for his good perſonage, for his wit, or for his quality. For my part, my Lord (answer'd my Friend) I ſhould be more ſcrupulous than you; for if I were not lov'd for my own ſake, I would not be lov'd at all. That which you ſay (reply'd the Prince) is plauſibly ſaid by one that loves nothing; but when a man is amorous, he turns to another language; and rather than never be lov'd, I would be ſo for a thouſand extrinſecal conſiderations, in which my merit has no part. As for me, my Lord (ſaid Anherbal) I am of opinion the more a man loves, the harder he is to be contented; and ſo, I confeſs ingenuouſly to you, that if I lov'd, I would be lov'd again for my own ſelf, and I ſhould make no eſteem of thoſe favours which I did not owe to a great affection. If it were in my power to chuſe (answer'd the Prince) I would wiſh that which you ſpeak; but it being otherwiſe, I content my ſelf with what I can; and there is nothing which I am not capable of ſuffering, rather than to be never favour'd. For the aim of love is the poſſeſſion of the perſon whom we love, and therefore this only ought to be ſought after, and all means whereby it is attainable are good, be it by wit, by merit, or dignity of condition. But, my Lord (reply'd Anherbal) do you not think that Lyſonice undoubtedly loves her Husband, and that Cloraniſbes is ſo zealous for your ſervice, that he deſerves you ſhould not deſtroy his felicity? I know all that you ſay (answer'd the Prince) but I know alſo that Cloraniſbes has betray'd me; and if I ſhall have no regard to his intereſts, I ſhould do againſt him but what he has done againſt me: and whereas you ſay, Lyſonice undoubtedly loves her husband, I have to answer you that an ambitious Wife may be more eaſily unfaithful than another; but becauſe I do not pretend to engage her in a criminal love, I will only oblige Cloraniſbes, as the Law permits, to reſign her to me, that I may marry her, and he may marry another. How? my Lord (ſaid Anherbal) do you care for having divided favours? if ſo, permit me to tell you with all the reſpect I owe you, that you know not how to love well. For according to the humour I am of, I ſhould like better never to obtain any thing of a perſon I lov'd, provided my Rivals were as unhappy as my self, than to obtain the highest favours on condition they were also granted to another. Ha! Anherbal (said the Prince) this that you speak is too heroic for me, and I am strongly perswaded it would be absolutely impossible but a man truly amorous, if he were put to his choice, to be favour'd with another Rival, or never to be so at all on condition no other should be more, would chuse rather to be favour'd in that manner than never to be at all. I know well there seems something unreasonable in that which I say (continued the Prince) but however I shall never conceive as long as I live, that a man can be unwilling to obtain the favours of a person whom he loves. I confess it my Lord (answer'd Anherbal) but yet as soon as I believ'd a woman capable of dividing her favours, I should love her no longer at all. Therefore my sentiments are not to be wonder'd at, being more truly amorous than yours. Be it how it will (said the Prince) I love Lysonice; and if she be willing to love me, and Cloranibes to resign her to me, I will marry her with joy; and I declare to you, there is nothing which I will not attempt to cause my design to succeed.

Anherbal spoke many things further to avert the Prince from this resolution, but they were to no effect. But that he might have more frequent occasion of seeing Lysonice, he recall'd the Princess of Carthage to Court, who was ravish'd to observe the Prince's passion, because she hop'd to make use of it to be reveng'd on Cloranibes whom she did not affect. To which purpose she made a thousand caresses to Lysonice, and sent to invite her to her continually. Cloranibes soon perceiv'd the passion of the Prince and the design of the princess; so that he was extremely afflicted at it, and could not keep himself from appearing sad, what resolution soever he had to dissemble his discontent. Whereupon Lysonice believing he was jealous, was much offended in her mind at it, because she could not endure to be suspected.

In the mean time the prince's passion augmenting every day, he resolv'd to discover it to Lysonice, and so afterwards to speak to Cloranibes of it, in case he found any favourable disposition in the mind of this fair person. Being it is always easie for a Sovereign to find occasion of speaking in private, he soon had one to open his passion to Lysonice; though indeed it fell out naturally enough, after a conversation which I am going to relate to you.

The prince found Lysonice at the lodgings of the princess of Carthage, where there were also Pasilia, Delisa and divers other Ladies: Anherbal was there too, and several men of quality. Cloranibes who attended on the prince, seeing Lysonice arrive, would have gone away, that he might not see such things in the eyes of his Master as would extremely displease him, though he was not jealous. But the Princess of Carthage maliciously detain'd him, upon a pretext of having something to speak with him about; for she liv'd very civilly with him, though she hated him. At first the discourse was about an insurrection which was at that time at Carthage; but insensibly passing from policy to Love, it came to be question'd, Who is the most unhappy, a Lover that receives a thousand favours from his Mistress, and is jealous of her, or one that obtains none other, and has no jealousy at all. For my part (said the prince) I put no comparison between these; for I account it the greatest of all unhappinesses not to be lov'd at all, and to obtain no favour from the person who is lov'd. Though I am not jealous (answer'd Cloranibes) nevertheless, my Lord, I am of an opinion contrary to yours, and strongly perswaded that a jealous Lover will be a thousand times more miserable, though he obtain a thousand favours, than he who obtains nothing, if he be free from jealousy. What? (reply'd the prince) do you conceive a greater infelicity in love than not to be lov'd at all, and to desire a thousand things which you dare not hope? Ha! my Lord (answer'd Cloranibes) there is nothing so bold as hope, and nothing so impossible which a man who loves ardently cannot hope. So that in his greatest torments he makes a comfort to himself which does not forsake him; the future seems more agreeable to him than the present; and hope never abandoning him, he is never altogether miserable. But on the contrary, a favour'd Lover, who is jealous, has nothing but fear for an inseparable companion. Every thing causes him to fear, every thing disquiets and afflicts him; and the very favours which he receives, becoming suspected to him, he imagines then when he is favour'd he is deluded, and that he is not treated well but only to be betray'd. All which you say, is very cruel (reply'd the Prince) but do you count it nothing to be continually in fear of being never favour'd at all? 'Tis a very severe sentiment (answer'd Cloranibes) but nothing near that which causes a perpetual fear of losing that which we enjoy and think we have purchas'd with a thousand services, and can never lose without injustice. Inasmuch as the fancy always magnifies all sorts of pleasures (reply'd the Prince) I conceive that a man not hoping to obtain the sweetest which he imagines infinite, is more miserable, than he who fears to lose a good which he knows what it is. Ha! my Lord (cry'd Cloranibes) as soon as the advantageous pre-conceiv'd opinion ceases in love, love it self ceases, and jealousy would cease also if it could. But whereas on the contrary, that prepossession of the imagination increases at the same measure that jealousy does, a man by continuing jealous, comes at length not only to believe that the good which he enjoys is the greatest of all goods, but withal to perswade himself that all the people in the world believe it such, desire it, seek after it, and are ready to ravish it from him. Judge therefore, my Lord, if there be any comparison between an unhappy Lover free from jealousy, and a favour'd Lover who is jealous. No (answer'd the Prince) there is none; for an unhappy Lover without jealousy, is so much the more jealous, in that he can never cause his unhappiness to cease; because it does not depend on himself. Whereas a jealous Lover, and who is jealous without cause, needs only to make a great resolution, and to make use of his reason to cure his evil. Ha! my Lord (cry'd Cloranibes again) you ill understand jealousy, if you believe a jealous man able to cure himself of the evil which persecutes him. On the contrary he increases it every instant, by false conjectures, ill-deduc'd consequences, a thousand groundless suspicions, continual fears, causeless reflexions, and imaginations void of all probability. A jealous man accounts nothing impossible, he believes he sees what he does not see, he believes he hears what he does not hear; there is not one of his senses but is liable to betray him, and his very reason, being perverted by his fancy, and no longer understanding the art to distinguish truth from falsehood, serves further to delude him, and render him more miserable. You speak so well of jealousy (said the Princess of Carthage maliciously) that certainly you must needs have been very very jealous : I say, have been (added she) for the vertue of Lysonice is too great to permit you to be so still ; and she is too fair to suspect you of having any other affection. Lysonice blusht at this discourse, and to hide her colour turn'd away her head, and fell to speak to Anherbal. As for Cloranisbes, he said gallantly enough, that the question was not about a jealous Husband, but a jealous Lover, and that in what manner soever the case were considered, he was wholly unconcern'd in the contestation. After this, there came some Ladies, who caus'd the conversation to change, and propounded to the Princess of Carthage to go take the air upon the Sea-shore, in a place where it is as streight as a and where it is as even as the course of the Olympick-Games. So that this motion being agreed to, all the Ladies went in Chariots, and men on horse-back, excepting Cloranisbes, who went not along with the company. When they were arriv'd at the Sea-shore, all the Court walkt a foot in the handsomest place of the World ; for when 'tis calm, the Sea as gently drives its billows upon the shore, as if it were no deeper than a small River. The sand of it is of a fair Colour, the shells which are seen on that side are very agreeable, and the herbs which the waves cast upon the banks delight the eyes with their lively and various colours. Besides, this vast extent of Sea which seems to unite with the Heaven, has a kind of grand aspect which pleases, and inspires respect. On the other side stands Utica which makes a handsome shew, and several other Villages, and many Cottages of Fishermen who by their rusticity adorn this maritime prospect. In one place people are seen drying their Nets, and others mending them ; in another, women making Baskets of Bulrushes which serve for fishing ; elsewhere Fisher-boats scatter'd upon the Sea, and men sitting upon the Rocks, who holding lines in their hands, are as attentive and immovable as the Rocks upon which they sit. But however, observe what a place it was in which all this fair Court went to divert themselves. The Sun was then setting, and his last rays gilding all the surface of the Sea, and painting all the Clouds almost with the very colours of the morning, presented so fair a sight to the eyes of Lysonice, that leaving all the rest of the company to go forward, she sat down by the Sea side upon a Rock cover'd with verdant moss, and fell to consider with pleasure these several effects of the declining Sun. But she had scarce began to muse, when the Prince leaving Anherbal to whom he was speaking, went to her, and respectfully interrupted her. I beseech you Madam (said he to her) tell me whether you decide the question in your mind, of which Cloranisbes and I lately disputed. In truth, my Lord (said she to him and rise up) I was not thinking of it, but I was only considering at this instant whether the Sea were not more graceful than the Sky. That's but an inconsiderable question to entertain the mind of a fair person (answer'd he) who has a thousand other things to think of : however, being this sight pleases you, stay where you are, and only suffer me to be with you. And so Lysonice placing her self again upon the Rock where she sat, the Prince seated himself upon another which was right against her, and began to discourse to her. I wish, Madam (said he to her) whilst your eyes are diverted with seeing all those tremulous lights which the waves beating upon one another shew you, you would really tell me, what sentiment you were of a while since during our dispute, and whether you would not more pity a Lover that were not jealous and had the unhappiness not to be lov'd, than one that were favour'd and extremely jealous. I am so perswaded (answer'd Lysonice) that such as are causlessly jealous deserve all the torments which they suffer, that I need not deliberate to determine my self in favour of an unhappy Lover, who is not jealous, and to grant him my compassion rather than to a favour'd and jealous lover, who almost ever becomes the most unacceptable Lover in the world, as soon as he is possess'd with a vehement jealousy. I am oblig'd to you, Madam (said the Prince to her) and I owe you many thanks. In truth, my Lord (answer'd she) you have no great obligation to me, since I only speak my opinion so as it is. I have more than you believe (reply'd he) and to leave you no ground to doubt of it, know, I am one of those unhappy Lovers, who love with favours and without jealousy, but who love so desperately, that never was any lover so miserable as I. When I engag'd my self to have compassion (said she) I did not imagine, my Lord, that you were concern'd in the case. That knowledge, Madam (answer'd the Prince) ought not to cause you to change that mind ; on the contrary, I am perswaded there is not one of my Subjects for whom you ought to have so much compassion as for me. Methinks (reply'd she smiling) it would be a want of respect for any to dare to say they have pity on their Sovereign ; and therefore, my Lord, you shall permit to seek out some other expression which may agree to you better. That you may find a more exact one (answer'd he) suffer me to tell you the greatness of my evil, for you cannot be ignorant of what nature it is, and no doubt you know, that after having lov'd your Picture which was less handsome than your self, I love you so ardently, that I have almost ceas'd to love Cloranisbes who has debarr'd me of that which belong'd to me, and hinder'd you from being Princess of Carthage.

Lysonice no doubt, was much amaz'd at this discourse of the Prince, though she knew he was amorous of her. But her ambition made it a little less ungrateful to her ; Cloranisbes discontent incens'd her mind, and she was infinitely troubled with the thought of his being jealous. But after all, the same temper which inclin'd her to ambition, caus'd her to love honour, and hinder'd her from being able to consent to a criminal love. Nevertheless, being she believ'd Cloranisbes guilty of disloyal proceeding both towards the Prince and her self, and alike deficient in generosity to them both, she did not reject the Prince with so much severity as she would have done in another case. I grant, my Lord (said she to him) I am oblig'd to you for the love you had for my Picture, and I ought as long as I live to acknowledge the advantageous intention you had for my fortune at that time ; but the case is not the same in reference to the love you say you have for me at present, which cannot be but injurious to me. Therefore, my Lord, do not destroy that first obligation by an injury ; for as ambitious as I am, that passion is incapable of exciting me to commit an unworthiness. I beseech you, Madam (said the Prince to her) do not suspect me of offering to do an injury to a person whom I adore ; I will but only love you, and I promise you too, to do all I can, that I may desire nothing else ; but if I cannot give bounds to my passion, my desires and my hopes, I will do all I can to obtain your permission to demand you of Cloranisbes ; for if you and he be so willing, the Law will permit me to marry you. There are examples of this kind, and you may cease to be wife of Cloranisbes, and still become Princess of Carthage. I know not, my Lord, whether the Laws allow what you speak of (answer'd she and rise up) but I know well, honour does not allow me to hear you further. Alas! I beseech you, Madam (cry'd the Prince, offering to detain her) do not make me desperate; for if you do, I shall hate Cloranisbes, I shall revenge myself of him, and be carried to the severest extremities. Consider that he minded his own contentment and not your advantage, but I require nothing of you which is not glorious unto you. No, no, my Lord (answer'd she and began to go towards the Princess of Carthage, who was coming to them) all the ambition of my heart shall never cause me to do anything against my duty; and therefore I conjure you not to persist obstinately in a design which will never succeed to you. The Prince could not answer her, because Lysonice having joyn'd with the Princess of Carthage, did not leave her all the rest of the evening.

But Lysonice seem'd so discontented and so pensive to Pasilia and Delisia, when she was return'd home, that they did not leave her in quiet till she told them the cause of her melancholy. Whereupon, having related to them the discourse she had had with the Prince; Well, too inquisitive Friends (said she to them) do not you think I have reason to be melancholy? Is not my Destiny strangely severe, to expose me to unhappinesses made purposely for me, and which come under the appearances of good Fortune? When Cloranisbes married me, I was so weary of being in Exile, that I believ'd I was going to be happy. Nevertheless, I pass'd from Exile to solitude, and I found I had only chang'd my discontent. After that, I came to Court, but there I have liv'd with a continual melancholy to see that Cloranisbes whom I thought had lov'd me well, has lov'd only himself, and hinder'd me from being Princess of Carthage. However, being he is a person of merit, perhaps I should at length have resolv'd to cure my self of my ambition and pardon him, if I had not observ'd in his heart, that if he is not jealous he may be: and for my utmost unhappiness, the Prince is become amorous of me, and propounds to me to separate from Cloranisbes and marry me. Judge then in what a condition I am; for although I am ambitious (added she) yet certainly I have affection for Cloranisbes; and should my anger have diminish'd it, I confess to you, I could not resolve to marry the Prince of Carthage. Such as marry again after the death of their husbands, I can by no means fancy; judge then whether I am capable of resolving to forsake Cloranisbes to marry another. But since 'tis so (answer'd Pasilia) I see no need you have to be greatly perplex'd. I am of your mind (added Delisia.) But for my part (excepted Lysonice) I am not at all. For do not you consider that if I be rigorous to the Prince, he will banish Cloranisbes; and if I keep fair terms with him, I shall increase his passion, and excite jealousy in Cloranisbes, who perhaps will send me back into the Countrey? Cloranisbes is so good a man (answer'd Pasilia) that you may always do what pleases you. Cloranisbes loves himself so highly (reply'd she) that 'tis for his own sake only that he loves me with such ardency, and so he will consider nothing but his own felicity. But what would you have him do? (said Pasilia.) I would (answer'd she) that if the Prince proposes to him to marry me, he love me so well, as to come and tell me that he will consider nothing but my satisfaction, and if I desire it, consent to our separation, that so I may be Princess of Carthage. Ha! Lysonice (reply'd Delisia) if Cloranisbes could part with you to the Prince, he would love you too little. But since you say (added Pasilia) you would not be the wife of two husbands, what matters it to you whether Cloranisbes consent or no to a thing which you do not desire? It is so great a matter to me (answer'd she) that I find I shall be much dissatisfied with him, if he be not so generous as to do what shall please me without exception. It must be confess'd (said Pasilia) the sentiments of people are very different; for if I had a Lover or a Husband who were capable of parting with me to the greatest King in the world, I should hate him. I am not of your opinion (answer'd Lysonice hastily) for if Cloranisbes consider only himself, I shall repine at him in my heart; and though I am resolv'd to continue his wife till death, yet I shall be so without any contentment; for I cannot endure those people who love only with respect to themselves, who consider nothing but their own pleasure, and mind nothing else. Such were the sentiments of Lysonice.

In the mean time the Prince's love augmenting from day to day, and the Princess of Carthage (who sought only to remove Cloranisbes from the Court) subtilly promoting it, she brought the matter to the utmost extremities, and took upon her to speak to Cloranisbes in behalf of the Prince, to persuade him to resign Lysonice to him. The discourse she made use of was subtle and crafty; she made semblance of pitying his unhappiness; she accus'd the Prince of injustice: but at last she gave him to understand that it was necessary for him to part with Lysonice. Cloranisbes appear'd sufficiently surpris'd at this discourse; for though he well perceiv'd the Prince's love, yet he did not believe the matter would have gone so far. His greatest discontent was, for that he imagin'd Lysonice could not but have given way to the Prince to make this proposal to him. However, he knew the business could not be effected without him; because the Law requires that both the Husband and Wife equally consent to their Divorce. But this did not hinder but that his mind was extremely perplex'd. I know, Madam (said he at length to the Princess of Carthage) that I owe all things to the Prince, yet this does not hinder but that there are many things which I may deny him without injustice; for, in fine, every thing which is impossible, is no part of my duty. I confess it (answer'd the Princess) but you can part with Lysonice, and consequently you ought, since the Prince cannot live without her, and you owe all things to him. I wish I had never lov'd Lysonice (reply'd he) and the Prince had married her. But, Madam, seeing the Gods have permitted that I am her husband, I shall be so till death. If the Prince will take away my life, I consent to it; he needs only chuse such a punishment as he pleases, I shall suffer it; but as for Lysonice, I will never surrender her, no, though she herself should consent to the Prince's design. Have a care what you do, Cloranisbes (said she to him.) I do all which I ought, Madam (answer'd he) inasmuch as I do all which I can. After this, this subtle Princess feigning to pity him, craftily confirm'd him in the resolution which he took, that so he might exasperate the Prince against himself. Which being done, he went to his own house, where the Prince had newly been, on purpose to tell Lysonice what what he had caus'd to be propos'd to Cloranisbes. 'Tis certain she very ill receiv'd him in spite of all her own ambition, and told him peremptorily, she would never be his Wife, though she much regretted that she was not. As soon as Cloranisbes enter'd, he understood Lysonice knew of the proposition which was made to him; and as soon as Lysonice saw Cloranisbes, she perceiv'd he had been spoken to about the Prince's design. So that being both sufficiently perplex'd, they remain'd some time without speaking; but at length Cloranisbes breaking the sad silence, Well, Madam (said he to her) will you be so generous as not to be offended if I desire that you continue in the enjoyment of the unhappy Cloranisbes all your life, and if I cannot consent that you be Princess of Carthage? You are so accusom'd not to love me but for your own sake (answer'd she) that 'tis easie for me to conjecture what answer you would have me give you. 'Tis as easie too (reply'd he) for me to guess what you would have me say to you; but I confess it, ambitious Lysonice, my love for you is still as great as your ambition; and therefore do not think it strange if I cannot resolve to part with you to the Prince. I know I destroy both my own fortune and yours, but I know I cannot resolve to lose you. 'Tis true (added he) perhaps I endanger displeasing you by not resigning you, and losing your heart by desiring to retain your person; but though you should hate me, I cannot cease to love you, nor consent that the Prince be happy with my loss, and enrich himself with my own treasure. But alas! whence is it that your love is not equal to mine? if it were, you would suffer banishment, and the subversion of your fortune would not trouble you: but to speak sincerely, you lov'd the Favorite of the Prince of Carthage when you lov'd me, without confiding in the person of Cloranisbes, and so 'tis no wonder if you love the Prince better than the Favorite. I hear all which you say (answer'd Lysonice coldly) as so many new signs of a self-interested love; however, to assure you that I will not marry the Prince, know, I have this day depriv'd him of all manner of hope. Ha! how happy am I (interrupted Cloranisbes) if you speak truth! Do not be so forward to thank me (answer'd she) for I do it more out of honour than affection; for, in fine, I confess to you, Cloranisbes, I am not satisfied with yours. You have been diffident of me, and could not resolve to tell me, that I might recover the fortune which you caus'd me to lose by your fraud. However, content your self, that I refuse an advantage which would certainly have affected my heart, and do not pretend I have any obligation to you for a deed which is likely to render both of us unhappy. The worst is, the mischief has no remedy, and our strange destiny will have us prove infallibly miserable. For being you love me only for your own sake, when time shall have a little chang'd me, you will likewise be chang'd towards me; and so I shall see my self without your affection, and you, perhaps, with repentance for having lov'd me. But be it how it will, I must resolve to seek my consolation in my self. If you lov'd me as well as I love you, and shall love you as long as I live (reply'd Cloranisbes) you would speak after another manner; but I am not so happy; and 'tis left only to my choice to be more or less miserable. You would certainly have been more happy (answer'd Lysonice) if you had less studied to be so.

As Cloranisbes was going to answer, one of his Friends came to inquire for him; to give him notice that the Prince of Carthage was extremely incens'd against him, and that his love of Lysonice was so violent, that it was capable to carry him to any kind of injustice. If he take away my life (answer'd he without being mov'd) he will oblige me; but to pretend to deprive me of Lysonice, is that which I will never endure. But you must know the Princess of Carthage (who design'd only to ruine Cloranisbes, and would not that her Brother should marry Lysonice) caus'd it to be told this fair person that the Prince intended to take her away by force; not doubting but this would oblige her to withdraw her self from Urica. For though she well understood she was ambitious, yet she knew too that she tender'd honour above all things. And accordingly Lysonice no sooner receiv'd this information, but shutting her self into her Closet with Pasilia and Delisia, she told them she absolutely resolv'd to go and return to her Father and Mother, in that fortified place which they held, without imparting her purpose to any person, not even to Cloranisbes himself; And then telling them what intelligence had been given her, I shall be so secret (said she to them) in my flight, because if the Prince should violently seize upon me, all the World would believe I was the cause of it my self, and nothing but death could manifest my innocence. 'Tis the best course therefore not to venture the having need of so violent a remedy. Not, that flight and solitude are of more value to me, but I shall at least have the advantage of making it apparent that I know how to over-rule my inclinations when I please. Pasilia and Delisia would have perswaded her to tell Cloranisbes of her purpose; but she was inflexible: No, no, (said she to them) 'tis best that he be able to say with truth that he knew not of my departure; that so the Prince may not accuse him of it. Wherefore without further delay, she pretended the next morning she would go spend the day at the house of a Lady which was her friend, standing without the City: but instead of doing so, she took a by-way which led towards the place where she chose her retreat. At night a slave came to tell Cloranisbes that she would lye at her Friend's house: but Cloranisbes said nothing to it, though it was not her custom; and the Prince being indispos'd that day, did not go to seek her. The next morning indeed he sent a complement to her to know her health; and when it was told him, she lay out of the City, he took a resolution to go visit her in the afternoon. But he was much astonish'd to receive a Letter from Lysonice, in which he found these words.

Accuse me not Cloranisbes of my departure; for I protest to you, my Lord, he knows not that I am gone: 'tis a design which I have put in execution without imparting it to him. But I believ'd I could take no better course for your quiet and my own, than to take a person from your sight who can never render you happy, but might render you unjust. I do not pray you to pardon me, but only not to hate Cloranisbes.

No sooner had the Prince read this Letter, but he was strangely transported both against Lysonice and Cloranisbes. So that as he is of a violent temper, he commanded some persons to ask Cloranisbes from himself where Lysonice was, and to secure him, if he did not tell precisely. Anherbal, who receiv'd this order, was very much perplex'd; for just as he arriv'd at his house, Cloranisbes had done reading a Letter which Lysonice had written and sent to him, and was conceiv'd almost in these terms.

Lysonice to Cloranisbes.

YOU will see by my flight that I do not care to be Princess of Carthage, and you will see by all my actions that you ought to have had more confidence in my generosity. But as for affection, expect none from a person whom you have never lov'd but for your own sake only. No doubt I will always do all whatsoever honour requires me, but look for no more from me. I justify you as much as I can to the Prince; 'tis all can be done for you by an unhappy person who will let you know the place of her sanctuary when she is at distance enough to be no longer in fear that the Prince of Carthage should violently seize upon her.

As Cloranisbes ended reading this Letter, Anherbal enter'd, and told him what order he had receiv'd from the Prince. Did I know where Lysonice is (answer'd Cloranisbes) I would not tell you; since I understand by a Letter which I just now receiv'd from her that the prince had a design to seize upon her by force: but in truth I have no hand in her flight, and I come to learn it by a Letter which she has writ to me. Anherbal being of late become one of his intimate friends, he accordingly shew'd him Lysonice's Letter, at which he was amaz'd. Wherefore he took upon him to go tell the prince that which he had seen, without securing Cloranisbes. But the prince interpreting all that was said to him as a collusion, fell into choler against Anherbal, and forthwith sent away the Captain of his Guards to arrest Cloranisbes, who was now extremely glad to know Lysonice was no longer at Utica. However, the prince sent after her; but being she travell'd all the day and night before, and took an unfrequented way, those whom he sent after her could not find her. Whereupon, he grew into a rage which nothing could appease, or equal; unless it were the grief of Cloranisbes, who in the midst of all those misfortunes resented more the displeasure he had in not being lov'd by Lysonice, than any of the rest.

As soon as this fair person was got to Bostar, this generous African writ to the prince to complain of his violence, and giving him to understand that if he us'd Cloranisbes ill, he would make his peace with the King of Maffilia, and forsake his part. But on the other side, the prince of Carthage, who intended to cause Lysonice to come back to Utica, answer'd him that Cloranisbes should never be at liberty unless Lysonice return'd, and that he would not promise for his life, if he deserted his party to take that of the King of Maffilia. Lysonice seeing things in this condition, remain'd resolute, and always declar'd that she would not return to Utica; notwithstanding Cyrene her Mother so represented to her, that perhaps she would be the cause of her husbands death, that she resolv'd to write to him by a secret way which was prescrib'd to her; and she writ in this manner.

Lysonice to Cloranisbes.

SEND me word whether you had rather see me a prisoner than be so your self; if you had, I will go to Utica to deliver you; for though you love me not but for your own sake, I will act generously for my own.

This Letter was secretly delivered to Cloranisbes, who answer'd to it in these terms.

Cloranisbes to Lysonice.

YOUR liberty is a thousand times dearer to me than my own; therefore take no care to deliver me, which perhaps death will shortly do, and then you will be Mistress of your self. If my Vows be heard, you shall be Queen of Maffilia, but never Princess of Carthage. And when I shall be no longer in being, remember I have never displeased you but through excess of love.

You may judge that this Letter did not oblige Lysonice to change her mind, and so she did not go to Utica: but neither did the prince of Carthage let Cloranisbes at liberty. Divers persons have bestir'd themselves in negotiating to accommodate so great a difference: but for that the princess of Carthage has so great a power over the prince her Brother, he is obstinate not to deliver Cloranisbes, against whom crimes of State are forg'd which he never committed, to the end the people may repine the less. Wherefore this prince having declar'd that unless Lysonice change her mind within four months, he will put Cloranisbes to death, this fair person believing I have sufficient influence over the prince's mind, has sent one of my friends to me to desire that I would return speedily, to endeavour the calming of this great storm; and by a rare chance, the prince, not knowing any thing of Lysonice's design, has given order to the same man, to come and command me in his name to return as soon as possible I can. But being uncertain whether I were in Sicily, or here, he pass'd through Agrigentum, where by the way he saw the generous prince of that place.

Oh! I beseech you (said Plotina interrupting him) tell me some news of him if you know any; for the prince of Agrigentum seem'd so worthy a man when the History of Artemidorus was related to us, that I should be glad to know whether you have heard any thing concerning him, and whether the amiable Philonic his daughter be still among the Veiled Virgins. 'Tis certain she is there still (answer'd Amilar) and a Lady a very faithful Friend of hers whom she left in the world, regrets her continually. But as for the prince of Agrigentum, he is married again to a person so accomplish'd that nothing can be desir'd more more to her. For there lives not a handsomer person in the world, and there never was any whose virtue has been more solid and more generally acknowledged, nor whose deportment has been more uniformly prudent, nor whose goodness has been greater or more agreeable. All the lineaments of her countenance are wonderfully handsome, her eyes have as much loveliness and sweetness as the most exquisite Painters can fancy; her mouth is very graceful, the shape of her visage very noble, her complexion admirably fair, her hair of a rare bright colour, her stature proper, her deportment comely, her aspect very modest, sweet, and discreet, her neck graceful, her arms pure, and her hands well shaped; and he that would represent virtue, must draw the Picture of the admirable Artelicia. All the world has approv'd the choice of the Prince of Agrigentum, whose generosity is perpetually the same. But, in fine, amiable Plotina, you see reason and generosity require me to take a voyage into Africa, to serve an unfortunate Friend, and to give the Prince an account of the state of affairs in Sicily. But being Love does not require it, I know not what will be done, and besides I feel I know not what kind of secret motion in my Soul, which tells me I shall not return into Africa. However, I would fain know a little better than I do all the beginning of your life. Content your self (answer'd Plotina) in knowing that you are much disfavoured in my heart, and let me leave what is pass'd, as that which we can have nothing to do with; but at present I have a great deal of pity for Cloranisbes. I pity him as much as you (said Valeria) and Lysonice also; for had she a little less ambition, she would be perfectly amiable. She is more so than you can imagine (answer'd Amilcar) and 'tis no wonder that Cloranisbes is still her Lover though he be her husband, and that the Prince loves her so far as to be unjust for her. But how came it (said Plotina) that you did not love her? As I never had any great passion before I saw you, Madam (answer'd Amilcar) so I became not much more amorous than I was willing to be; and therefore having regard to my friendship with Cloranisbes, I over-ruled my heart in spight of all Lysonice's charms, and left it for some days between the hands of Pasilia or Delisia; for to speak sincerely, I know not to which of the two I made most courtship; but this I know with certainty, that I have never lov'd any so much as you: and assuredly it ought not to be much wonder'd at; for it is not so frequent to meet with extraordinary persons who can inspire great passions. Youth excites nothing but delight; beauty, nothing but desires; virtue alone, esteem and respect; great wit, admiration; eminent goodness, friendship: So that to frame a person who may produce at the same time delight, desires, esteem, respect, admiration, friendship, and love, it is requisite that she be indu'd with all that I have mention'd, and together with all these, with an inexpressible pleasingness, such as you have. For, as for my part, I could sooner dispense with the want of extraordinary youth, and great beauty, than that I know not what charmingness which is found in your eyes and in your wit. And, in fine, I speak boldly to the disparagement of beauty, I have all my life profess'd I would have a Mistress who could please me without seeing her, with whom I might walk in the dark without tediousness and melancholy, and who was also fit to be an agreeable Friend, in case it should come to pass that I lov'd her no longer as a Mistress. You speak very prudently (reply'd Plotina) but to be as wise as you are (contin'd she) I think I should have done well not to countenance the affection of a stranger; for I begin to fear your departure more than consils with my quiet. Ha! charming Plotina (said he) how delightful to me is this which you say, and how powerful to retain me eternally with you! While he was speaking thus, one brought a Letter, the superscription of which was address'd to Plotina: but having open'd it, she found that it was not intended to her, and contain'd only these four Verses:

*Charming Hermilia! here at Rome, I deem'd
I only as a friend had you esteem'd:
But now I find your absence does discover
This truth unknown before, I am your Lover.*

Plotina had scarce done reading them, but Hermilia enter'd, and gave her a Letter open'd; Certainly (said she to her) Ottavins must needs have been mistaken, for he directs a Letter to me which does not suite with me. You will be confirm'd in that opinion (answer'd Plotina) by reading this which I give you, which will manifest to you, that my brother is really mistaken. Hermilia took it and read it; but as she was reading it, she blush'd, and her melancholy renewing at that instant by the remembrance of her Brother and her Lover, the tears came into her eyes. Which nevertheless she restrain'd, and returning Plotina Ottavins's Letter, I am so perswaded (said she to her softly) that in the condition I am in, I am fit only to excite pity, that I cannot think I have been able to excite Love. Besides, if it were so, Ottavins would be more unhappy thereby: for in truth I love my grief so much, that I believe I should hate whosoever would comfort me of it. Plotina would have answer'd Hermilia if Telanus had not arriv'd, who brought Theomenes to them, and told them that at the very time he was speaking, Galerita, the Princess of the Leontines, the generous Melintha, the charming Hersilia, all the friends of Aronces and Titus too, were speaking in his favour to Porfenna; and he promis'd that the next morning he would let them know what the success was. But who is this Hersilia you speak of? (said the fair and melancholy Hermilia) What? (said Plotina looking attentively upon her) did not you take notice, the day the Queen of Hetruria came hither, of a very fair person who was with her, to whom Melintha was almost continually speaking, and who has so lovely an air? I assure you (answer'd Hermilia) I observ'd nothing, but had my mind fill'd only with my own sorrow, whilst that great Court was here. Were it but only to do something new (said Amilcar) 'tis fit to draw you the Picture of a person whom you saw and did not see. For my part (said Plotina) who am charm'd with her beauty, I shall be ravish'd to understand a little more accurately who she is: and as for me (said Valeria) seeing she is Melintha's friend, and does Aronces service, I am very curious of all that relates to her. Theomenes can better content your desire (answer'd Telanus) than any one, for he is Hersilia's intimate friend. I am ready to do what the company pleases (said Theomenes) but if the fair Hermilia has not the same curiosity, I shall speak nothing of her person, but only of her wit and virtue. 'Tis true (answer'd this illustrious Sister of Brutus) few things in the world can make me curious; but being I am conscious that it is not just to molest all the world continually with our grief, and that when we seek not to cure it by death, we ought to over-rule it, and learn at least to live, without appearing incivil and humorous; to reproach my self of my weakness in not being able to overcome my melancholy, I will confess ingenuously, that I know not whether Herfilia is brown or fair, tall or low; and next, I will demand of you, what manner of person it is whom you esteem, and who (I understand) is universally esteem'd. Know then, Madam (said Theomenes) Herfilia is of a very comely and agreeable stature. Her hair is the fairest brown in the World, her visage oval, her eyes large and handsome and of something a darkish blew, which renders them more sparkling and agreeable. She has a handsome mouth, pure teeth, and the air and cast of a sprightly person, of a person of condition, and of a person of the Court. Her Physiognomy is noble, there is lustre and delicateness in her beauty; she has no affectedness neither in her looks, nor words, nor actions; and though she has sometimes I know not what little discontented and fierce air, yet it serves rather to render her amiable than diminish her Charms. Her gracefulness is enforc'd, she dresses her self very exquisitely, and especially her head to the best advantage without shewing too much or too little art therein. One thing is very peculiar to Herfilia, namely, that without appearing morose, never any other Beauty was so averse from all thoughts of Gallantry. In effect all the Court renders homage to her virtue, and has an extraordinary esteem for her. Herfilia's heart is naturally very noble, and her mind of good temper; she sees things as they are, and acts always as she ought. She is naturally magnificent too and generous, she is faithful, secret, and discreet; and though she is not the freest person in the world of her caresses, nevertheless she is always very civil. She loves few people ardently, although otherwise she is a very generous Friend. She is much affected with merit, and carefully seeks all opportunities to serve such as are deserving. She understands handsome compositions exactly, and without making ostentation of her wit, they that write Verses well cannot judge of them better than she. She is skill'd in divers Foreign Languages, she speaks very agreeably; and there is something I know not what so charming both in her person and in her mind, that she cannot be too much extoll'd. Having a considerable charge under the Queen, she has many times occasion to give proofs of her conduct, address, and judgment; but whatever occasion she meets with, she always comes off with glory; and it may be said, in brief, that Herfilia is a Lady infinitely amiable. When she does not esteem any one, she is sufficiently put to't to conceal it; and she is more absolutely Mistress of her inclination than of her aversion. Her piety is solid, and not like theirs, who affect a certain outside austerity which scarce ever reaches to the heart: and it may be said without untruth, Herfilia is so accomplish'd, that no greater perfections can be desir'd in any person. Moreover, she is highly respected by the generous Artander her husband, who has an eminent Office and a very considerable Government under the King, and who no doubt deserves to have such a vertuous wife as Herfilia. For he is of an illustrious family, has an heroic mind, great judgment, and capacity to manage the most difficult affairs. He is honorable, just, and valiant as any mortal can be; he has done several great and glorious actions in the Wars, which have acquir'd him a fair renown. But his valour produces neither vanity, nor pride, nor insolence in him; and no man can be found that exceeds him in modesty and prudence. He has some backwardness in his first addresses; but being very civil too, his serious humor does not disoblige any; and in fine, it may be concluded that if Herfilia is worthy of Artander, Artander is worthy of Herfilia. All which Theomenes has spoken is so true (said Telanus) that if he be deficient in any thing, 'tis in not speaking enough of those two excellent persons. I acknowledge it (answer'd Theomenes) but the cause of it, is, because I am so accusom'd to the modest humor of Herfilia, who will never have any to commend her, that I dare not so much as praise her in her absence; so great a fear I have of stirring up that amiable little frowardness, which she is sometimes in railery reproacht with, and withal which so well becomes her. But I would know (said Amilcar) whether the fair Hermilia, who saw her and did not see her, the day the Queen of Hetturia came hither, has not heard that which Theomenes has spoken, and not attended to him. No (answer'd this fair Virgin) and I know now so well what a person Herfilia is, that if I still took any care for the World, I would wish all my heart resemble her. You have no doubt wherewith to comfort your self without resembling her (said Plotina) but 'tis true, if you ought to cease being such as you are, you would have reason to desire to be such as she is; since she is certainly a very lovely and excellent person. It needs be no wonder then that the generous Melintha loves her so much. Yet their humors are not alike (said Amilcar) but having both of them very prudent wits, they never clash, even in such things wherein they do not agree. The truth is (said Telanus) Melintha is much taken with the delights of solitude, which Herfilia does not care for: but this diversity of sentiments produces only an innocent contest, which occasions them to speak very agreeable things. When Herfilia (added Theomenes) is for some days at a little place of retirement, which my Sister much affects, she reproaches her pleasantly for taking more pleasure, in seeing from her Windows great Boats loaden with several Countrey-commodities pass by, than in seeing some stately Horse-race. For my part (said Plotina) I should side with Herfilia in this contest against Melintha: And I should help Melintha (said Valeria) to defend her self against Herfilia. For I think nothing more delightful than to see Boats afar off going to and fro upon a great River, to behold the Flocks dispers'd in the Meadows, the Shepherds playing upon some rustick Instrument, and the Shepherdesses dancing at the corner of a Wood. Then you would like Melintha's little house well (said Telanus) for all things there are solitary, Country-like, and agreeable. In what place is this lovely solitude? (demanded Valeria.) It is near Clusium (answer'd Theomenes) but I undertake not to describe it to you; Telanus must do that, if you desire to know what manner of place it is. I willingly consent thereto (reply'd Telanus) for I confess to you, I am extremely pleas'd with it. Tell us then precisely how it is (said Plotina) but have a care what you speak, for I advertise you, Amilcar who hears you, knows how to make the description of a handsome place admirably. I am so accusom'd (answer'd Telanus) to yield to Amilcar, that I shall not be surpris'd if I be inferiour to him in the art of making descriptions. For my part (said Amilcar) I confess to you, I shall be much troubled if you surpass me. Happen what what will (said Telamus, after he had been desir'd to represent the house of Melintha) I shall tell you the solitude I am to describe has something so pleasing in it, that all Palaces must yield to it. But that which is more remarkable in this matter, is, that the admirable Melintha has made so considerable an alteration in this place, that it may be said she has almost wholly transform'd it. The first time I was there, I could not conceive it could become agreeable, the Garden behind the house was so exceedingly narrow, and all the ground was so declining and uneven that one would have thought he walkt upon the side of a precipice. So that though the prospect of this place was very handsome, yet it was enjoy'd from so incommodious a station, that this diminisht part of its delightfulness. Nevertheless in a very short time and with no great expence, Melintha has render'd it such as I am going to describe to you. The Court is of a largeness proportionable to the house, all which is seen of the building appears new and of a graceful plainness. There is a Hall which has a Chamber at one end and a kind of little Gallery at the other. It is open in the midst of the side towards the Garden, which two stages of stone-stairs lead into, from whence is seen a green plat terrass'd, of a very reasonable greatness, a rustical Garden beneath, which leads insensibly descending into a little Grove, whose shadiness is so much the more agreeable, for that there is heard from thence the murmur of a very pleasant River which passes hard by. But to return to the stone-perron whence I have drawn your imagination, conceive, that you see from thence not only the terrass'd green-plot, the rustical Garden, and the little Grove, but above twenty miles distance, with so charming a variety of objects, that nothing is more agreeable. For beyond all that I have mention'd there is seen a delightful River, in which are several little green Islands embellishing it in that place, between which many little Boats are seen passing to and fro. But a hundred paces from thence, this pleasant River goes toward the right hand to discharge it self into a greater, which is seen coming afar off; and being it comes winding, it is seen in several places at a great distance. So that beholding the water on both sides, this little corner of Land wherein many Flocks are feeding, seems almost an Island between two Rivers which make an admirable shew; and beyond which are seen many handsome Villages, till the sight loses it self: and on the left hand a rustick bridge and a little house beyond, whose irregular structure contributes something to the handsomness of the prospect, as well as several remote Temples which are seen in divers places of the Plain. But having describ'd this pleasant Landskip to you, which is seen from all the apartments of the house, I must lead you up a curious and goodly stair-case, and cause you to enter into a Chamber, the hangings of which are blew and silver, and the Windows reach from the top to the bottom, that so the sight may be more free. Next, I must lead you into a little place in which there is nothing but chains, a little Table, two admirable Pictures with gilded frames, the designs of which having some correspondence to solitude, agreeably fill the imagination. For in one of them is seen a very handsome woman, represented in a wild Country, wherein no living thing appears but this fair person, who seeming to be driven out of the World, leans upon a Tree in a careless manner, which manifests that the light it self is no longer the object of her view, so retir'd she appears into her self. Her graceful fair hair is dishevel'd upon her shoulders, the whiteness of which cannot be surpass'd but by the complexion of this solitary fair, in whose countenance is seen so sweet a sorrow, that joy it self never caus'd any thing so agreeable. Her whole posture has a negligente full of sadness, which corresponds to her sentiments. As much as is seen of her body is admirable, the little clothing which appears is natural, the Landskip is done to the life, and, in fine, this piece is worthy of the excellent Painter who drew it, of the amiable place wherein it is, and of the admirable person to whom it belongs. But from this so delightful Cabinet you pass into a little Chamber, the most pleasant that ever was seen. The furniture of it is Grey, Isabella and White; there is also a very handsome solitary Landskip, the Bed stands in a little room apart: On one side of which is a large Window open from top to bottom, like all the rest, which have an Iron-rail to lean upon, of exquisite workmanship; and on the other, another great Window which opens into a little Closet, painted and gilded, where there is a Tablet in which Jupiter is portray'd, and where Melintha performs her devotions to the Gods, on such days as she cannot go to the publick Temples. But to conclude the description of this retreat of the admirable Melintha, you must know, that returning out of this little Chamber and the Cabinet where the Picture of the fair Hermit is, you go into a Chamber, the Tapistry whereof is silver and blew, and from thence enter into a Cabinet which is the handsomest in the World, out at a great Window of which is seen the same prospect which I describ'd to you before. The form of this Cabinet is square; it is neither too high nor too low roof'd, it is hung round with goodly Pictures whose frames are richly gilded, and which being of two different sizes, are plac'd in a very agreeable order. The fretwork has a very handsome piece in the midst, wherein the Painter has admirably represented sincerity, under the figure of a fair woman holding her heart in her hand. All the ornaments which encompass this piece are very exquisite, and all the other pictures which are seen in this Cabinet, by the design of the excellent Painter who drew them according to Melintha's order, represent several kinds of Landscips, and solitary persons inhabiting them. Such melancholy objects are seen in some of them, that they move the hearts of the Spectators; in others, so sweet a solitude, as makes the solitary inhabitant envied; and, in brief, there is so lovely a variety in all these pieces, that Nature has not more in her productions than the admirable Painter has express'd in his works. But amongst the rest, there is a piece which hangs over a Couch, in which designing to represent several sorts of grief, he has done it so admirably, that it cannot be sufficiently commended. I forgot to tell you that on the side the door is of which is opposite to that of the Window, hangs a Looking-glass, which receiving all the objects of the prospect, gives a pleasant sight of it to one that looks not upon it. In a corner of this Cabinet a little Bay is contriv'd within the thickness of the Wall, to place Books in, where also Melintha would have a piece put, whose sight alone should excite sentiments of piety, notwithstanding any indispositedness thereto: but this is not seen, but when one pleases. To conclude, this Cabinet is so handsome, so uniform and so stately, that there is no Palace in the World wherein it might not be admir'd. Thus I have shew'd you this little house, which pleases Melintha far more than a greater and fairer, which she has caus'd to be built at Clusium. I wonder not if it pleases her (answer'd Plotina) for as you represent it, I think I should delight to see Boats, Shepherds, Shepherdesses and Flocks of Sheep out of that amiable Cabinet: especially (added Valeria) if there be good company. I agree with you (answer'd she) that agreeable company does no hurt; but, humor may add to the delight of the handsomest Desert in the World. But however, 'tis fit to do justice to Telannus, and confess that if he does not surpass Amilcar in descriptions, he may pretend to equal him. I beseech you (said Amilcar) do not determine things so precisely, but rather give an ambiguous judgment, so that either of us may believe he has the advantage. Be it how it will (said Theomenes) you may be both commended without our fearing to misplace our praises.

As Theomenes was speaking thus, there was heard a great noise from without the Tents, which Telannus going to see what it meant, found it was caus'd by Souldiers quarrelling about Aronces, some of them saying the Camp ought to make an insurrection to deliver him; others, that it behov'd always to obey Porfenna, who knew well what he had to do. Telannus would have appeas'd and accorded them, but an old Souldier addressing to him, How? my Lord (said he to him) shall we let Aronces perish without attempting to deliver him, who is all our hope? No, no, it must not be; Porfenna may remember that heretofore himself was not deliver'd but by violence. We are newly told (added he) that the King speaks of putting him to death as soon as he has found Mutius: but it must not be endur'd that he commit this injustice, and we shall serve him, in serving Aronces. Hereupon Telannus judging it might be dangerous for Aronces to have the Army shew too much ardor for him; to pacify the incens'd Souldiers, told them he knew the Prince would shortly be cleared, and freed from his imprisonment: whereby he repress'd part of their violence, and went to re-assure the fair Romans, whom the noise had alarm'd.

This evening and the next morning, the Queen of Hebruria, the Princess of the Leontines, and all the friends of Aronces made their utmost instance for him to Porfenna; but to no effect: for he was so perswaded Aronces and Mutius had conspir'd against him, that he could not have been more, if himself had been an ear-witness of their Confederacy. And therefore (said he to the Princess of the Leontines) 'tis only out of regard to the formalities of justice, that Aronces is not yet dead; and as soon as Mutius is found, and they whom I have in custody shall maintain before him and Aronces that they were the instruments of this horrid Conspiracy, which Love excited them to, nothing shall be able to hinder me from giving that great example of justice, which I owe to Posterity and my own preservation. All Aronces's Friends perceiving reasons, sentiments of nature, and prayers prevail'd nothing with this prejudic'd Prince, told him he hazarded to see Rome against him, and to cause his own Army to mutiny. If you are minded to hasten Aronces's death (answer'd he) you need but speak as you do; for if my Subjects rebel for the Criminal Aronces, 'tis a sign that he is a rebel himself, that they look upon him as their head, and that the best course I can take is to punish a Parricide speedily. The friends of Aronces would have reply'd, but the cruel Tullia arriving, they could not; because the King signify'd that he was minded to be alone with her. Yet they repin'd so loudly that Tullia heard their murmurs: but being us'd to complaints and curses, she was not mov'd at them, but made shew of not having heard them. As for Tarquinius, he continu'd at his Quarter, that he might keep his Forces in their duty, whilst Tullia promoted her dismal negotiation. Titus indeed was much devoted to Aronces's interest, and was continually active for him: but as for Sextus, he had nothing in his heart but love for Clelia, and was so transported with it that he thought of nothing else. For whilst all the Camp was in Alarm, Tarquinius and Tullia were contriving to destroy Aronces, and all the Friends of this Prince in the Camp or at Rome were studying to save him, Sextus was devising to carry away Clelia; for in this confusion the Hostages were guarded with less circumspection, though Porfenna on the contrary had commanded they should be kept most carefully. In order to which, Sextus corrupted some of the Souldiers which guarded Clelia, assur'd many to him of the King his Father, and whereas the Tents of these fair Romans were upon the bank of Tyber, he gave order to have Boats in readiness to convey her away by night. He prefix'd a day and hour to do it, and hop'd so well to carry on and accomplish his purpose, that it might be believ'd Clelia was carried away either by the Romans, or by the friends of Aronces, for fear Porfenna should treat her rigorously. Moreover, he resolv'd to send her to Cuma, because he had an intimate friendship with the Tyrant which reign'd there at that time. On the other side Amilcar going and coming continually from Rome to the Camp and from the Camp to Rome, divers consultations were held in both these places for the deliverance of Aronces; but no sure course could be found out for bringing about so just a design. Some judg'd it best to get the Prince out of Prison, that so he might afterwards justify himself in freedom; but such as knew him well, believ'd that should his Guards be forc'd or corrupted, he would not have recourse to flight, for fear it should argue him to be criminal. Others thought it most expedient for the Camp and Rome to rise of a sudden, and go demand Aronces of Porfenna with Arms in hand; but a Treaty having been made with this King, and Rome not being in a condition to venture a second Siege, the Senate would not have consented that the Pacification should be infring'd. Besides, the twenty fair Romans who were given in Hostage, having Lovers at Rome, they were not forward to suffer any such resolution to be taken as might bring them into danger. Some there were also who propounded to go to Tarquinius's Quarter, and following Mutius's example, kill the Tyrant with the execrable Tullia: but this Proposition was not approv'd. However, that something might be done, it was resolv'd that Artemidorus and Themistius, being two great Princes, should go to Porfenna the next day, to tell him a very considerable truth: for he interpreted Mutius's departure to be a flight, and it was at length discover'd to proceed only from a despair of Love. For the last conversation Mutius had with Valeria made a deep impression upon him; so that being desirous to try whether, whilst she was at the Camp, he could more easily bring Publicola to be favorable to him, he went to him, and spoke to him with an air so little submissive, that it was apparent he behav'd himself like the deliverer of Rome. At which Publicola being displeas'd, answer'd him with a generous sincerity which cast him into despair; for he so clearly intimated to him, that he should not take his daughter from Herminius, that he became desperate, leaving Publicola in a great fury, and soon after departed from Rome. Whereby it was easie to judge that Love was a greater cause of his absence than any other consideration. It was therefore resolv'd that Themistus and Artemidorus should go to Porfenna the next day, and tell what they had understood from Publicola, to the end Matius's departure might no longer pass for an evidence against Aronces. Not, that what they had to say was a convincing truth, but it was at least a favourable presumption; and being they could do no better, they did as people use to do in great misfortunes, namely, rather to do a hundred things unprofitably, than fail of doing one thing which may be beneficial.

But whilst all in Rome or the two Camps, were deviling to destroy or save Aronces, this unfortunate Prince indur'd the greatest torments an amorous heart which loves honour is capable of. He saw himself accus'd of a horrid crime, by a father whom he had deliver'd from a long imprisonment, and whose life he had sav'd, and by a father whom he respected still notwithstanding the injustice he did him. But that which afflicted him most, was, that the letter he receiv'd from Clelia, perswaded him either that she believ'd the accusation charg'd upon him, or else accus'd him her self of something; and to augment his grief, he saw he had lost the Letter, which might be of some ill consequence to him if it were in the hands of Porfenna: so that his affliction was more than can be imagin'd. But he did not suffer alone; for Clelia's mind was more disquieted than ever any persons in the World. She lov'd Aronces more than her self; but she could not but believe, or at least fear, that he was unfaithful to her. She wish'd nothing with more ardor than to hear Porfenna was appeas'd, and nevertheless she could not hear without indignation that Lysimena acted with that generous confidence which led her to speak to Porfenna whatever she believ'd might advantage Aronces, without considering that this augmented Zenocrates's jealousy: for being she knew her self innocent, she conceiv'd it would be easie for her to justify her self at any time; and therefore she continued to act the same generosity in so important an occasion. Which so disgust'd Clelia, that she almost wish'd the prayers Lysimena made to Porfenna would take no effect, that so Aronces might not owe his life and liberty to her. Plotina and Valeria being the confidants of all her sorrows, she spoke of nothing else to them when they were alone, especially at nights; for these three fair persons lay in the same place, not, but that it might be said that these twenty fair Romans were in one and the same Tent, because they had communication one with another; but nevertheless, they had in a manner every one their own. Clelia, Valeria, and Plotina being one evening together lamenting their misfortunes, Clelia told her Friends she had still more cause to fear some greater, than they knew of; For I beheld (said she to them) or thought I beheld the virtuous Lucretia last night, and I imagin'd too I heard her voice. Being unhappy people (said Valeria) seldom have pleasing Dreams, 'tis not to be wonder'd if that dismal Idea came into your fancy. 'Tis true (added she) considering what befel her illustrious Lover, these kind of advertisements seem not altogether to be rejected; for if you remember, Lucretia appear'd to him. Tell us therefore in what manner you thought you beheld that fair but unfortunate Lady. My discontents, as you may imagine (answer'd Clelia) strangely possess my mind, so that I never sleep but out of weariness. Hereby it hapned, that it was almost break of day before I shut mine eyes. In this condition I know not whether my heaviness forc'd me to sleep, or whether I was really awake; but me thought I beheld a good great light, which nevertheless was somewhat dusky too; a moment after Lucretia appear'd to me fairer than ever I saw her, her hair was dishevell'd, she was cover'd with a large white Robe, and held a bloody Ponyard in her hand. In this posture methought I heard her voice, which was something terrifying. Flee, Clelia, flee (said she to me) but flee speedily; for I advertise you that the Tyrant, who caus'd me to have recourse to this Ponyard, has a design against your honour as he had against mine. Have recourse therefore to flight, and bring not your self into the necessity of being oblig'd to have recourse to death. After this, the light disappear'd, Lucretia vanish'd; but the sound of her voice has made such an impression upon my mind, that all this day I have done nothing else but think upon what I imagin'd I saw and heard, and had not so much power as to tell it you: besides, having not seen you alone, I was unwilling to speak of a thing which seems only fit to make me suspected of having a mind something weak.

Clelia had scarce done speaking this to her Friends, when one of their Guards enter'd into their Tent, with a certain hasty air which signifi'd he had some important matter to tell. I beseech you, Madam (said he to Clelia) pardon me the liberty I take of entering into your Tent; if Lucilius or Telanus had been come back from the King, I would have address'd my self to them; but being they are not here, and I cannot tell that which I have to say, to him that commands us in their absence, I address to you, to advertise you that Sextus will carry you away by violence, if you do not take care to prevent it. I have not been able to learn whether he intends it this night or the next; but I know infallibly he hath laid all his contrivances for that purpose; several of my Companions are to be assistant to him, he that commands us is his Creature, he has Boats in readines, and is himself to serve in this violence. Wherefore, Madam, conceiving I could never serve the Prince better than by serving you, I come to give you this intelligence. The business is urgent (added he) and I understand the design as fully as possibly one can. But by what means came you to know it? (said Clelia much affrighted.) One of my companions, Madam, (answer'd he) who would have engag'd me in this criminal design told me of it, and I made shew of consenting to it, to the end I might give you notice of it. Valeria, Plotina, and Clelia, ask'd this man divers other Questions, who answer'd them with so much ingenuity, that they were assur'd he did not lye. They thanked him for his generosity, and desir'd him to tell Telanus, as soon as he came from the King, that they must necessarily speak with him; and in case Telanus did not return speedily, to come himself to speak with them. Well, my dear Sister (said Clelia to Plotina) the apparition of the virtuous Lucretia is but too true, and am not I very unhappy in seeing my self lov'd by the most infamous of men? Was not I sufficiently oppress'd with the misfortunes of Aronces and his infidelity, without being more so by mischiefs more dreadful to me than death? But, in fine (added she) I am not resolv'd to await this dismal adventure;

I must go from Tent to Tent to awake all my Companions, oblige them all to stay with me, till the return of Telanus, and engage them by Oath to stick to me, and rather tear me in pieces, than suffer me to be carri'd away by the infamous Sextus. If Telanus comes (said Plotina) it is absolutely necessary that he give way for us to escape; for in the condition things are, we know not who to have recourse to. For my part (said Valeria) I know not whether we should do well to violate the Laws of Nations by going to Rome though we might, or whether it would not be better to have recourse to the Princess of the Leontines. No, no, (answer'd Clelia) I will not be oblig'd to that Princess; and as things now are, I believe she would not be as serviceable to me as she is to Aronces; and besides, do you think Porfenna will at present believe any thing against a Son of Tullia? We must therefore begin to assemble all our Friends together; and so Clelia causing a maid-slave to light her, was follow'd by Valeria and Plotina through the lines of Communication which went from Tent to Tent, where they awaken'd Hermilia, Colatina, and all the rest. But after they were come together into one and the same Tent, the Soldier who discover'd the plot to Clelia, came to tell her that Lucilius and Telanus had sent notice that they would not lodge there that night, because some affairs requir'd their presence elsewhere. Wherefore Clelia interpreting this as an artifice of Sextus, who caus'd them to be retain'd, that he might the better effect his design, was in a very terrifi'd condition, and the death of Lucretia coming into her mind at the same time, she thought every moment she beheld Sextus entering with his Soldiers to carry her away. All her Friends partaking of her fear, counsell'd her the best they could; but she having a great heart, No, no, my Companions (said she, beholding some of them with tears in their eyes) 'tis to no purpose to weep, we must this day shew that we are Romans, that we love honour, and that death cannot daunt us; for do not imagine (added she) that this design regards only me; all they that serve a ravisher, are ravishers themselves; and I do not question, but the infamous Sextus has promis'd you to such as are to be his instruments in so criminal an action. But were it otherwise (contin'd she) I will believe that the affection you have for me, and the sense of honour would lead you to be willing to save me, and to take a resolution to make an escape from this place, where we cannot but every moment be expos'd to the insolence of the two mutinous Camps, which in all probability will shortly fall foul together. Let us then make a daring and generous resolution; our Tents are upon the Bank of Tyber, and there is no way to escape but by the River. If we dye, we shall die with greater glory than Lucretia, since it will be in avoiding an unhappiness, which she would not out-live. I know it will be said at Rome, that we violate the Treaty; but every thing may be lawfully done to save our honours. Nevertheless that you may not think (added she) I will cause you all to be drown'd for my preservation, and expose you to an inevitable danger, hear what course I conceive fit to be taken. You know when we came out of Rome, we were adorn'd like publick Victims to be sacrific'd to the peace; so that we have many Jewels amongst us: let us promise all we have to the Souldier who gave us this intelligence, on condition he will be serviceable to us; let us not wait for the return of Lucilius or Telanus, nor tempt them to be unfaithful to the King of Hetruria, who committed us to their custody; but let us only devise how to deceive our Guards; we may easily do it, provided that Soldier and some of his companions be for us; let us send to him who commands in the absence of Lucilius and Telanus, to desire permission to bathe our selves at break of day, which without doubt he will grant us; for being perhaps 'tis the night following wherein he intends to convoy me away, he will believe this will facilitate his design. But when we come to the Water side, you shall do what you see me do; ask me no more, but leave me to manage this enterprize. I require no more of you, but of what I will my self shew you an example: but above all things, to continue your selves in the generous resolution which I see you inclinable to, consider always, I conjure you, that the business is no less than to keep our selves from being under the power of the murderer of the virtuous Lucretia, that glory attends us on the other side of the Tyber, and that we shall eternally dishonour our Country, if we be so pusillanimous and weak as to incur a misfortune which we may avoid.

Clelia spoke with so much courage and eloquence, that all her companions hastned to give her their Jewels, swear not to forsake her, but to follow her example and pleasure implicitly. After this she went to speak to the trusty Souldier, and communicating her design to him, she gave him some gratuities, and promis'd him more; which done, he went to the Officer who commanded the Guard, and whose name was Minutius, to demand his permission for all these fair Virgins to go and bathe themselves in the Tyber about break of day. He made no scruple to grant this request; and gave orders to such as were to conduct them, without suspecting any thing of the design; for Rome being on the other side of the River, he could not think these Ladies would imagine it possible to get thither. Besides, being Hostages, and Sextus design in all probability unknown to them, he was on the contrary very glad of their beginning to bathe themselves in the River, inasmuch as it might prove convenient for his enterprize. But to bring it so to pass as to send such Souldiers the next day to conduct them, as were privy to this Plot, he sent others this day; the order of Military duties requiring successive attendance of several persons. In the mean time the Souldier whom Clelia had gain'd, provided Planks, Hurdles, and Bavinges; it not being possible to get either Boats or Horses: he also suborn'd some other Souldiers to assist him, with the Jewels Clelia gave him, and in brief, he did all that was in his power. Now when break of day was come, these twenty fair Virgins having spent the whole night without sleep, went forth under the conduct of those that were order'd to guard them. It was no lighter when they left their Tents, than just enough to discern things, and to perceive the agitation of the River through the Willows which grew upon the Bank of it in this place. The place was unfrequented, agreeable, and fit for the execution of Clelia's design. The Souldier who was of intelligence with them, hastning to bring them to the place where Tents were erected for them in the River, led them through a way beset with Willows, whose tops were interwoven together, and seem'd to make a kind of rude Canopy; and at length they arriv'd at the place where they made shew of intending to bathe themselves. They who guided them stay'd at a distance out of respect, to leave them to undress themselves; and some of them too were were corrupted to do so by Clelia's Complotter. But the Ladies not thinking them remote enough, desir'd them to retire a little more back; which they did. And as soon as they saw them at a good distance, the honest Souldier who was hid behind a bush to assist them, shew'd them the Planks, Hurdles and the Bavines, which he had caus'd to be brought thither secretly, and had so well fitted that each of them could bear up a person in the Water. But when Clelia counted them, she found there was one fewer than needed; at which she being nothing abash'd, No, no, (said she) my companions, trouble not your selves who it shall be that wants something to support her in the water, my courage shall support me, and the Gods will assist me. Let us not therefore lose time (added this magnanimous Lady) the moments are precious; this valiant Souldier whom you see shall help the weakest, and I am so perswaded Heaven will be aiding to us, that I doubt not in the least but we shall all happily get to Rome. The God of Tyber sav'd Horatius when he leapt into it in his Armour; he will save us perhaps as well as him.

After this, Clelia having invoc'd the God of the River, without expecting the answer of her companions, cast her self courageously into the water, and turning towards them, If you love glory (said she to them) you will follow me; and so abandoning her self to the stream of the River; she was carried from the shore. There was no delay, but her companions instantly did the same; and the Souldier, having so handsomly ty'd some to the Planks, others to the Hurdles and Bavines which he had provided, that there was no fear of sinking, he leapt into the Water after them, and sometimes helpt one, and sometimes another: their cloaths also were of some use in this occasion to bear them up. But there hapn'd a remarkable accident; for as Clelia turn'd her head now and then to see whether her companions follow'd her, she found a Horse in the midst of the River, which had scap'd from one that led him to drink; whereupon this courageous Lady got hold of his Bridle, and made shift to mount upon his back. By which means advancing her self above the water, and day being much clear'd up, the Souldiers who had guarded her, were extremely amaz'd to see her and all her companions about her, whom the officious Souldier help'd forward as much as he could; for they who, were not corrupted, believ'd these twenty fair Virgins were in the Tents prepar'd for them upon the River. On the side of Rome, they who perceiv'd a woman upon a Horse swimming in the middle of the River, and follow'd by others who were supported by Planks, Hurdles, or Bavins, knew not at first whether they were not men disguised in the habits of women, and whether this were not some subtle project of Tarquin: so that they were thinking to shoot Arrows at them; and had indeed done so, if Horatius and Herminius had not happily arriv'd. For, as Lovers know their Mistresses at a greater distance than others, they were no sooner upon the Bank of the River, but they knew Clelia and Valeria. Which sight so surpris'd them, that they were thinking to cast themselves into the River, to go and meet them; but this first sentiment being pass'd, reason caus'd them to take some Boats which were there to go meet these courageous Ladies, most of whom were so weary that they receiv'd this succour with joy. In the interim the Souldiers who had guarded these fair Romans, having given the Alarm all about, the Bank of the River was in an instant beset with an innumerable multitude of Souldiers on the side of the Camp, that of the City was as much throng'd with the Inhabitants. Now because these fair Virgins were not in condition to go through the Streets, Horatius and Herminius led them to a house standing near the side of the River, where they dry'd themselves and chang'd their clothes for others which they sent for from their Parents houses. After which, they all went to the first Consul, to give an account of their escape, and to desire him to inform the Senate of it. But they were follow'd with an incredible throng of people, who by this time knowing Clelia was she that undertook this adventurous action for the preservation of her honour, gave her a thousand praises, and extoll'd her above all the Heroes of Antiquity. When Publicola beheld this fair company arrive, he was surpris'd at it; for though the rumour of it was brought to him before, yet he did not believe what was told him. Clelia, as principal of the enterprize, went formost, and as soon as she saw Publicola, My Lord (said she to him) if that which my companions and I have done seem unreasonable to you, I conjure you to lay the blame only upon me, for they have done no more but followed me; and if the Senate conceive me culpable, I am ready to undergo such punishment as shall seem good to them to inflict upon me; for I dread neither pains nor death, I fear nothing but infamy. After this Valeria beginning to speak, inform'd Publicola of the violence intended by Sextus, and omitted nothing that might serve to justify the action which they had done. Your fact is so glorious (answer'd Publicola, speaking to Clelia) that were it unjust, it would nevertheless deserve to be eternally commended; nothing undoubtedly being more heroical, than to preserve one's honour with the hazard of death. But since you have acted for yours, you must suffer Rome to act also for hers, and therefore I enjoin you all to stay here till the Senate have deliberated upon the action which you have done.

Then Publicola leaving them to the charge of Domitia, gave order that the Senate should be extraordinarily assembled. In the mean time Clelia, Sulpitia, Octavia, Racilia, Flavia, Salonina, Artemidorus, Themistus, Merigenes, Emilius, Spurius, Acrisius, Sicinus, Damon, and all the relations of these fair virgins, came to visit them, every one making a complement to them according to their humor or inclination, and all extolling Clelia with a kind of contest. Horatius was extreme joyful in this occasion, and found such pleasure in the glory of his Mistress, that he had not greater when he perform'd that grand action of the Sublician Bridge. He fanci'd that Clelia's leaping into Tyber as he had done, was a happy preface to him; and it was some delight to him, to think that Clelia fled from a place where Aronces was. But if his own thoughts gave him hope, the looks and words of Clelia gave him none at all: but on the contrary having spoken a moment with her apart, he found her mind still firmer to her old resolution. At least, Madam (said he to her) do not make me unhappy before the time, leave Fortune to act as she pleases, and act your self as you are minded; but do not forbid me to hope that perhaps you will one day find your self forc'd by destiny not to hate me. All humane prudence can foresee nothing, three days ago you would not have believ'd you could have attempted to cross the Tyber without a Boat, and nevertheless you have done it with an heroical magnanimity. 'Tis true (answer'd she) none can foresee their own actions; but such as are prudent, prudent, cannot and ought not to change their sentiments. Nevertheless (reply'd he) 'tis frequently requisite to conform our selves to matters according to the time. As for such Wisdom (answer'd Clelia) I renounce it with all my heart: that which is just once, is always so; I never cease to love that which I love; and even the infidelity and death of Aronces shall never cause my heart to change. I say more (added she) for supposing what is absolutely impossible, that I could cease to love Aronces, and have such an affection for you as you desire, you would not be the happier for it; for a pure sentiment of honour would hinder me from expressing any thing of it, and I should die a thousand times rather than do any thing that might make me liable to the reproach, that I lov'd twice in my life. But, Horatius, matters are not in these terms; and I speak to you as I do, only to put you out of all hope, and so to oblige you to be hereafter contented with my esteem and friendship. Alas! Madam (said he to her) if you could but cease to love Aronces, I should not want much of being happy: for I conceive it not possible that a heart disengaged from all passion could resist mine. Have I not told you (answer'd she) that though I should love you (which yet can never happen) you would not be the less miserable? Ha! Madam (reply'd Horatius) if you lov'd me, you would be no longer Mistress of your own sentiments, but speak after another manner. But, alas! I am not yet so happy, and perhaps never shall.

Whilst Horatius was speaking thus to Clelia, Herminius was conversing with Valeria; but for his unhappiness, it was in the presence of Emilius and Spurius. Plotina was also importun'd by Sicinius, Acrisius, and Damon. As for Octavius, he address'd to Hermilia, who though she did not receive him rigorously, yet she gave him greater cause of despair than if she had been more severe: for after divers passionate expressions which he us'd to her, To testify to you that I esteem you (answer'd Hermilia) I will discover to you my real sentiments. I confess then, that considering things according to the course of the World in general, it would be very advantagious for me if I could love you; and the illustrious and unfortunate Brutus would no doubt have judg'd your affection very glorious to me; for that your Birth is noble, you have wit, courage and virtue; but, generous Octavius, having lost the Prince of Pometia, whom all the world knows I did not hate, I cannot, I ought not to love any hereafter. When a Lover is lost by his own inconstancy, I conceive in process of time another may be admitted; but when a faithful Lover is lost by death, fidelity ought to be reserv'd to his ashes, and never any thing lov'd but his Memory. These, Octavius, are my true sentiments; you know in what manner I have lost an illustrious Brother and an illustrious Lover, help me to lament them, and I promise you all my friendship; but desire nothing more of me. Had the Gods heard my vows, I should have miscarri'd in crossing the Tyber; but though I did nothing toward saving my self, the too-kind River bore me up whether I would or no. For my part (said Plotina, who overheard these last words) I assure you I neglected nothing to preserve my life, and certainly I must needs love honour and Clelia ardently, to have indanger'd my self as I did: but however, I do not wonder to see so many brave Warriors (added she) for no doubt example serves much to beget courage; at least, I know, if I had been all alone, I should not have had the power to put my self into the Tyber, without other help than a pitiful plank to which I was fastned: but when I beheld my sister courageously leap into the water, without plank or hurdle, Valeria as resolutely follow her, and Hermilia hasten to do so too, I would not be the last, but left Collatina the honour to bring up the rear. 'Tis true (answer'd that fair Virgin) I was the slowest, but I assure you, the reason which you imagine, was not the cause of it, but rather for that I was not unwilling the generous Souldier who did us such good service, might be near me when I enter'd into the water. I perceive (said Plotina) neither the love of Honour nor the greatness of danger do deprive you of your judgment. I am less astonish'd at that (said Valeria) than to see that nothing abates your joy. I assure you (answer'd Plotina agreeably) that the joy which appears this day in my words is an habitual joy, wherein my heart is not much concern'd. Whilst these fair Virgins were discoursing thus together, Domitia told them several times, it would be best for them to betake themselves to sleep; but they had too great a desire to know what the determination of the Senate would be. And indeed it was a matter extraordinary and important enough, to make them curious and solicitous about it.

When the Senate was assembled, Publicola faithfully reported the business as he understood it from Clelia and her Companions; he highly commended the courage of these generous Virgins, and especially of Clelia, who attempted so daring an action. Then he added, that the people being much taken with extraordinary adventures, would declare themselves for Clelia; and that as he pass'd the streets, he observ'd they approv'd what this generous Lady had done. After which, it belongs to us (saith he) to consider what we have to do, both for the good of the Commonwealth, and for our own honour; for though I have a daughter amongst those who have certainly offended Porfenna, yet I am not backward to declare, that for preserving the Public-faith, it is requisite to remand them to him again. Some Senators less generous than Publicola, who had daughters or Kinswomen amongst these Hostages, decry'd it as cruelty to send these Virgins again under the power of an incens'd Prince, who was capable of putting his own Son to death. But Publicola answer'd, that events ought to be left to the will of the Gods, and that in all cases our duty is to be perform'd. Which advice of Publicola prevailing, the Senate ordain'd that these twenty fair Virgins should be sent back to Porfenna, to whom the true case of their escape should be manifest'd, thereby to oblige him to guard them more carefully: but it was however resolv'd too, that a Statue on Horse-back should be erected to Clelia in the high part of the Sacred street. Even Clelius himself though much afflicted to see Clelia return to the Camp, was of opinion that she should be remitted thither. But as for Horatius and Herminius, they would not deliver their minds in this occasion, being unable to determine to say any thing that might intrench upon their honour or their love.

When the Assembly was broke up, Publicola return'd to his own house, follow'd by Horatius and Herminius; as he was entering in, he saw Amilcar amongst these fair Romans, who came from the Camp, and inform'd him that Porfenna being exasperated by Tarquin, Tullia, and Sextus, was in a high indignation at the action of Clelia, that the next day he would send Embassadors to redemand the Hostages, and that if they

they were refus'd to him, he had sworn to break the Peace and destroy Rome. Amilcar added, that Por-senna imagin'd Clelia did this action only out of fear lest she should be forc'd to tell what she knew concerning the pretended Crime of Aronces, and that all things therefore deserved to be carefully examin'd. He added too, that it was a very great unhappiness for Aronces that Mutius was absent. Amilcar spoke this to Publicola in the presence of these twenty fair Virgins who with much impatience expected that the first Consul should inform them of the deliberation of the Senate. But they were astonish'd to hear two such different results; for Publicola first told them what honour the Senate had done to Clelia; and then (which increas'd their wonder) that it behov'd them to resolve to return to the Camp the next day. At the first News Clelia cast down her eyes out of modesty; but at the second, she blusht out of indignation; nevertheless, having consider'd the Publick-interest which caus'd the Senate to act so, she recollected her self, and beginning to speak, We must obey, my Companions (said she looking upon them) and if I find my self in danger of a new unhappiness, instead of flight I will have recourse to death, and never ingage you to follow me. Clelia spoke this with so resolute and generous an aspect, that all who beheld her, judg'd she deserv'd greater honour than the Senate had decreed to her. Horatius's affection receiv'd new flames hereby; for if beauty produces love, 'tis only virtue which preserves and augments it long after its production. However because Clelia was willing to avoid Horatius, and perceiv'd her Companions and her self needed rest, they retir'd into the several Apartments which were prepar'd for them; for, being they were to depart early the next morning, to return to the Camp, they would not separate themselves: wherefore though the house Publicola now dwelt in, was not so stately as that which formerly he so generously destroy'd, nevertheless, these fair Virgins were well enough accommodated in it. But before they retir'd, Clelia inquir'd of Amilcar concerning Aronces, and understood by his answer that he had none but unwelcome News to tell her of him; so that she withdrew with Valeria in the greatest melancholy in the world. Come (said she to her) let us go prepare our selves to dye, and perhaps to see the unfortunate Aronces put to death. After which, she went into the Chamber which was provided for her, leaving Amilcar speaking to Plotina and Cesonia; but she went with so deep a sadness upon her countenance, that it excited grief in all that beheld it.

IOVERS scarce ever forbear to speak of their passion to their Mistresses when they find opportunity for it; wherefore Clelia was no sooner retir'd, but Amilcar seeing himself alone with Plotina and Cesonia, us'd such discourse to them as sufficiently manifested the sentiments of his heart. I know well (said he to Plotina) I am requir'd by reason to leave you, but for my consolation I will go pass the evening with Cesonia, that I may speak of you, and that with a person who loves you. For my part (said she to him) I am so weary by having watch'd so long and pass'd over the Tyber without a Boat, that I dare not promise you the like; for how melancholy soever all my companions are, I believe they are so sleepy, that should I desire to speak of you, I should find none to hear me. But dispense with me at this time, even for thinking on you; for sleep has the privilege to make us forget every thing, without a crime. However (said Amilcar) permit Cesonia to tell me all which I desire to know concerning you. I consent to it (answer'd she as she was going away) but take heed your curiosity give you not more trouble than pleasure; and besides it is not incident to persons addicted to jollity to have great adventures; but all extraordinary events are reserved for the melancholick. As soon as Plotina had said this, she follow'd her companions, and Amilcar went with Cesonia. When he came into the Chamber of this amiable Lady, he pray'd her she would please to relate to him all she knew of the adventures of Plotina's life. As for her birth (said he) I know it already; but that which I earnestly desire of you, is the History of her heart; that is, in one word (added he) I would know by whom Plotina has been lov'd, and whether she ever lov'd any person much. Being Plotina has permitted me to content your curiosity (answer'd Cesonia) I will do it, and the rather because I have no great number of events to relate to you, and I am well inform'd of all that has pass'd in Plotina's heart. And so Cesonia giving order for none to disturb her, began in these terms to speak to Amilcar, who dispos'd himself to hear with extraordinary attention.

The History of Plotina.

WHEREAS you know already how Plotina believ'd her self Niece of that wise Friend of Clelius (whose name is Rutilius) and accounted his Wife, Ersilia, her Aunt; I need only tell you that my Mother's house (for my Father was deceas'd) was next to that of Rutilius, and that there was a great friendship between Ersilia and she to whom I owe my life.

I will not detain you with describing the manners, customs, or gallantry of Ardea, being I conceive you may easily judge there cannot but be very commendable people in the place where Plotina could become such as you see her. For it must be said to her glory, she owes none of her perfections to Rome. Besides, I remember Plotina related my adventures to you heretofore; and so I doubt not but she told you, our City was built by Danae, though some conceive it was a Son of Ulysses and Circe that founded it: but this last opinion has no other ground, but that as Ulysses was very eloquent, and Circe well skill'd in the knowledge of all the Vertues of Herbs, so they speak more politely at Ardea than in any other City, and better understand the good or bad qualities of all Plants. I know also she told you that since the shower of gold Jupiter made use of, such women as affect glory accept nothing from a gallant in which there is gold; and that for magnificence, elegance of manners and gallantry, it exceeds all other places in Italy; and that Poetry and Painture are more in request and famous there. This being suppos'd, I am to tell you, that Plotina has always been so amiable, that as soon as she was six years old, her wit was spoken of with admiration. She us'd to speak a thousand surprising and ingenious things, and that with all the graces of childhood, and with so charming an air, that it was not possible to see her without loving her. Though I was two years elder, I could not live without seeing her; all her answers were pleasant, innocent and witty, every thing in them was natural, and she spoke nothing but of her self. She had a quick fancy and a sprightly wit, she danc'd gracefully even before she learnt; and whatever she did, it was becoming and pleasing. As she was one day in a Temple, where the whole History of Danae is admirably represented, and beheld the golden shower falling into the Tower where Danae was inclos'd, she ask'd what the meaning of it was. Herfilia telling her that Jupiter being become amorous of Danae transform'd himself into that precious rain for her sake, that so he might get to see her; she said this invention did not please her. Because (added she) it would have been a better course, for Jupiter to have employ'd his gold to corrupt those that guarded Danae; and then he might have appear'd with the more grace before his Mistress. Another time, observing one Cupid represented with a Torch in his hand, and another with a Bow, she was ask'd which of the two she lov'd best: at first she said, she lov'd neither one nor other, as all children use to do. But when she was press'd to tell which of them she thought to be the most dangerous, she answer'd immediately, I fear him that burns more than him that wounds; for I have heard a shot with an Arrow may be cur'd, but if my heart were reduc'd into ashes, I believe there would be no remedy for it.

it. I could tell you a hundred more pleasant things of Plotina's childhood if I would, but 'tis best not to insist upon them. Yet I cannot but tell you something of a conversation which we had together when she was about twelve or thirteen years of age, and how impatient she was to be no longer treated as a child by them which discours'd with her. For my part, my dear Cesonia (said she to me one day as we return'd from a great Feast) I am so weary of being a little Girl, that I wish I could have bought the two years by which you exceed me, with the ten last of my life. I assure you (said I to her) I account your place better than mine; and in reference to years, 'tis better to be preceded than to precede others: for you will infallibly be fifteen years old if you live, and I am pass'd being thirteen any longer. For my part (answer'd she with a pretty discontent) I was a thousand times more happy when I was but six, for I did not care then in what manner I was treated. I play'd with a thousand little trifles, and provided I were not hungry, sleepy, chidden, or too much instructed to have a good carriage, I was the merriest person in the World. But now I am thirteen years of age, and to my unhappiness have my reason of seventeen years at least. I am displeas'd almost with every thing, and I see scarce any people whom I do not hate. But wherefore do you hate them? (said I to her) all the World commends you, caresses you, and speaks to you. 'Tis true (answer'd she) but all the World commends, caresses, and speaks to me as to a child. So that I had rather a thousand times, be neither commended nor caressed, nor that any person would speak to me. But, I beseech you (said I to her) what are really your discontents? In the first place (answer'd she) all men I meet with are nothing but Fortune-tellers concerning me, foretelling the future, but speaking not the least word of the present. All the Girls which are but sixteen years old, scarce take any notice of me at all. As soon as I come into any place with Herfilia, they speak of giving me some edibles to employ me with, and think I would be displeas'd if I did not eat; and as for men, they, as I told you, do nothing but make predictions of me; though these are the most civil, for the others, minding their affairs, look upon me as a little child, to whom they know not what to say. But who are these Fortune-tellers? (said I to her, laughing, and pretending not to understand her.) All men which I know and which you know (answer'd she:) yesterday Turnus, only seeing me enter into your house, cry'd, Ha! she will be a dangerous Lass one day. Periander the other day said in my presence, I would certainly be very handsome, when I became a little more fatter and taller. Lycastes added, I would shortly be of a handsome stature; Martius, that when I came to have my Neck longer, I would be much more charming; Livius, that as soon as I knew I was handsome, I would be infinitely more amiable; and my Mother also, speaking of me to her particular Friends, says sometimes, I shall one day be witty if I will: so that all my charms are in the future. But if these Prognostications (added she) speak true, and that I prove terrible, hereafter, unless they be dead of age before, I will make them all dye of love, and so ill treat them, that I will be fully reveng'd on them for the little care they have at present to please me. If I be not deceiv'd (said I to her) 'twill one day be in your power to revenge your self. Well (answer'd she hastily) do not you make Predictions of me too as well as the rest. Thereupon I laught heartily at the choler I had put Plotina into unawares; for indeed she never lov'd that kind of commendation which regarded only the time to come. You may judge by what I tell you that Plotina had a forward wit, and was already very agreeable. But in a little time she made it appear sufficiently, and most of those that had made such advantageous predictions were in a condition to speak to her only of the present time, and of the torments her beauty caus'd them to suffer.

This passage (said Amilcar interrupting her) puts me into the greatest fear in the world; for I am ready to dye out of conceit that you are going to tell me Plotina has been lov'd by many more deserving persons than my self; and I am afraid too, you will inform me she has lov'd some one of my Rivals more than she loves me.

Do not fear so much as you pretend (answer'd Cesonia) lest I tell you Plotina has had more worthy Lovers than your self; and for the rest, you may judge what you ought to believe of it, when I come to the end of my relation. I shall therefore proceed to tell you (added she) that the merit of Plotina soon made a great report, and she saw all those makers of predictions speak to her only of the time present. Yet it must be said to the honour of Plotina that she did not suffer her self to be dazzled with the applause of the World, but with very great modesty receiv'd the first praises that were given her. And indeed she was very debonair without folly, pleasant without extravagance, young without imprudence, witty without pride, and handsome without affectation. Then it was that I began to converse with her as with a true Friend; I first intrusted little trifling secrets to her, and perceiving she us'd them discreetly, I imparted to her the greatest secrets I had in my heart. Whereby our friendship became so great and intimate, that in speaking of us people were many times pleas'd to mention us by the name of the two Friends. At that time there were very many worthy persons at Ardea; for besides Turnus, Periander, and divers others, there were three of undoubted merit. The first was named Martius, the second Lycastes, and the third Clerantus. This last has a noble, but very sweet and civil aspect, though sometimes his air seem a little cold and careless. He has brown hair, a very handsome head, somewhat a long visage, a pale complexion, black and small eyes, but nevertheless his looks are very ingenious, and even his silence speaks him such; for in discourse, he hears, like one who admirably well understands that which is spoken to him, and who could speak more than he does. All his deportments are such as become a man of his quality, and his mind is perfectly fram'd for converse with the world: he loves ingenious composures and their Authors; he has a melancholy aspect, and nevertheless loves all pleasures. His Soul is naturally passionate; and though the outside of his person and his mind speak him one of those faithful Lovers which the world so rarely affords, yet he is always a serious wanton, or if you will, a tolerable inconstant; for no doubt some are not such. However he maintains confidently that he is faithful, because he says he never deserted any woman who gave him not cause of complaint. He is one of those who account it no infidelity to make little affections occasionally by the by, which arise in their heart during their greater passions. But this is constantly true, where he loves, he loves ardently, he minds nothing but his passion, he is very inclinable to jealousy, jealousie, he resents the least displeasing things with a strange vehemence; and, in fine, is acquainted with the greatest delights and the extremest rigours of love. As for Martius, he was a man who lov'd very passionately, was incapable of relinquishing one Mistress to love another, but whose affections could only abate by time. He was very handsome, infinitely ingenious, and endu'd with a pleasing kind of wit. And then for Lycastes, he was a very agreeable person, but he was naturally so inconstant, that it was reckon'd amongst the wonders of Love, if any one could engage him to love constantly once in his life. Being we were known to all the virtuoso's of Ardea, and there were few in the City more consider'd than Plotina, and I, we were present at all the Gallant Feasts which were made. One was made at that time in honour of Circe, who is termed Goddess in Homer, in which were represented divers of those prodigious transformations which are attributed to her, and in which Plotina appear'd so charming, that her beauty and debonarity made the discourse of all persons. That day she made two remarkable conquests, which caus'd her to be call'd for some time after the new Circe. For she who sometimes wrought such extraordinary changes by the virtue of simples whose proprieties she so admirably understood, never did any more deserving wonder. But to manifest this, you must know, that till that time Lycastes had made publick profession of being inconstant, and that Martius had formerly been very amorous of a very fair Lady by whom he was also lov'd; yet afterwards according to the general course of the world, it was believ'd this passion was grown so temperate, that it could be call'd love no longer without doing him a favour. So that when she was dead, he appear'd very much afflicted first, but suffer'd himself to be comforted by time and his Friends; and indeed it was thought he lamented her rather like a Friend than a Lover. 'Tis true, after her death he had not appear'd amorous; yea, he seem'd very indifferent; but at length on the day of this famous Feast of Circe, Lycastes and Martius ceas'd to be what they had been before; that is, the first learnt to love constantly, and the other ceas'd to be insensible, and began to love again. But such beginnings of love being usually not so discernible as to be known the first moment they attack the heart, Lycastes and Martius did not believe they could be very amorous of Plotina, and their Friends perceiv'd it before themselves. Now Plotina being of a free and merry humor, these two Lovers were sufficiently at a loss for an occasion to give her seriously to understand they lov'd her, when they perceiv'd it: for she so handsomely put off all that they said to her, that it might seem their love was nothing but a piece of Gallantry, in which their hearts were unconcern'd. But at length they found that they lov'd ardently. For their passion began to manifest it self by jealousie; they could no longer endure one another but with trouble, they minded nothing but Plotina and how to please her. They frequented none but her, abandon'd all their acquaintances, and in brief had nothing but their passions in their heads. On the other side, Plotina having always been averse to Marriage, and now unwilling to commit a criminal Gallantry, did certainly all she could to deprive these two Lovers utterly of hope: but this rigour augmented their love in stead of diminishing it. Wherefore Plotina being loth to trouble her self longer to no purpose, left them to follow their own inclinations, without being kind or favourable, or considering one more than the other. Yet one day she gave Lycastes a severe check in the presence of Martius, Perfander, and Lucia (who is a very amiable Lady) for the profess'd it absolutely impossible for her to love a Lover that has been inconstant. If any of those rambling Lovers (answer'd Lycastes) should become a faithful adorer of you, wherefore would you not love him, provided he have otherwise desert? Because (reply'd she hastily) that which has hapned once may happen a hundred times, and nothing would be more insupportable to me than to be abandon'd by a man to whom I had given permission to love me. Therefore, not to venture that mischief, 'tis best avoid giving it to any: for the world is so full of inconstant Lovers who dissemble fidelity, that it is easie to be mistaken. Plotina spoke this with an air that intimated to Lycastes, it would be a hard matter for him to win her heart. Nevertheless, he found he had so well shaken off his old inconstancy, and that he should love Plotina faithfully, that he hop'd time would mollifie her. For my part, I confess my inclination then led me to favour Lycastes; and thought Martius was a very worthy, handsome, and agreeable person, yet I was more concern'd for his Rival. But I perceiv'd one day Plotina was not of the same mind, but had a little more inclination for Martius than for Lycastes. However, she carefully conceal'd it; but for all her care, not only I, but Lucia, Lycastes's Kinswoman and Friend perceiv'd it too. This person had formerly seem'd an intimate friend of Martius's Mistress, she saw the beginning, progress, and end of this love, in which she had an interest, which I shall tell you presently. As we were both one day with Plotina, we hapned unwittingly to speak of the power of inclination. For my part (said Plotina) I do not believe it so powerful as 'tis reported, at least I am perswaded I never yet lov'd any thing without reason. You believe this (answer'd Lucia smiling) and yet at the same time I am speaking to you, your inclination prepossesses your reason, to the disadvantage of one of my friends. Perhaps, 'tis yours (reply'd she) which is, prepossess'd. If you will let Cesonia be judge (said Lucia) I will explain myself more clearly. I assure you (said I to them both) I am very equitable. 'Tis a great vanity in you to believe your self so (answer'd Plotina) for I know nothing more difficult than to please others and ones self too, and 'tis observable that such as speak best of Justice are usually most unjust. But I beseech you, why do you accuse me of suffering my self to be prepossessed by my inclination? Is it not true (said Lucia) that I have heard you say a hundred times, you could never endure the affection of a man that has been inconstant? I confess it (answer'd she) and 'tis for that reason I am not mov'd with the merit of your Kinsman, and never shall be. But wherefore (said Lucia) will you suffer Martius more favourably? I assure you (answer'd Plotina) I do not treat Martius much better than Lycastes: but if I did, I could maintain it were out of reason and not through inclination; for Martius has never been inconstant. Martius never inconstant? (reply'd Lucia hastily) Ha! Plotina, you are but badly skill'd in inconstancy, if you believe as you say; for I maintain on the contrary, that that inconstancy, which Martius may be reproacht with, is more criminal than that whereof Lycastes has been accus'd before he lov'd you. But I do not remember (said I then to Lucia) I ever heard it said that Martius lov'd any person but Plotina, since the death of Lyfimira, of whom he was so amorous, and who was indeed infinitely amiable. 'Tis true (answer'd Lucia) but after Martius had lov'd that amiable person five or six years, and receiv'd a thousand testimonies of innocent affection from her, he came by degrees to have only so luke-warm an amity for her, that she is dead with grief, although he was not perfidious to her, but preserv'd his formalities to her. Perhaps (reply'd Plotina) that person as lovely as she was, had some bad humor, which caus'd the Love in Martius's heart to be extinguish'd: but though it were not so, yet I should not conclude that Martius ought to be call'd inconstant; for 'tis so ordinary to see time abate Love, that I still make a great difference between Lycastes and Martius. For my part (said I) I confess I term all changing, inconstancy; and 'tis a mistake not to call any inconstant but such as love several persons. For is not that luke-warmness which comes after an ardent Love, a kind of inconstancy? and is it not sufficient to deserve the name of inconstant, if we cease to love that which we once affected? I know not very well whether you have reason and I am mistaken (answer'd Plotina) but I know well, I do not regard Martius and Lycastes alike. That's it (reply'd Lucia) you are unjust in. Should you say (added she) Martius is more ingenious, deserving, and agreeable, I should be patient; but to treat Lycastes ill for inconstancy, and to suffer Martius, who ceas'd to love one of the most charming persons in the world, is a thing which I cannot approve. But Lycastes (said Plotina) has forsaken a hundred. I grant it (answer'd Lucia) but should he have forsaken a thousand, he would be less culpable than Martius who has deserted but one. For Lycastes never did more than begin to love, till now; his heart no sooner inclin'd on one side, but it was sway'd to the other by some new inclination; wherefore having promis'd scarce anything, nor lov'd long enough to cause himself to be lov'd, his inconstancy seems to be free from a Crime, though it may be refer'd to levity. But as for Martius, he lov'd, divers years together, he was lov'd again, and that ardently, and possess'd her heart whom he lov'd. A thousand respects ought to have fastned the eyes of his affection; and nevertheless, without cause, reason, or pretext, his passion has ceas'd to be passionate; that which formerly delighted him no longer affects him, his Mistress is scarce his friend; and so changing his sentiments without any extrinsecal cause, he becomes in my opinion, the most criminal of all inconstants. But, perhaps you will except, that he was not lov'd correspondently as he lov'd; to prove what the passion of that unfortunate Beauty was, read, I beseech you, an Elegy, which that charming person made under feigned names, during a short absence of this Martius whom you would excuse. And that you may judge her more passionate, know, that after Martius had given a thousand testimonies of Love for several years, and receiv'd as many from that incomparable person, he came by degrees to have an unequal Love (if I may so speak) that is, to do things sometimes which denoted a violent passion, and sometimes others which might make him suspected of having almost an indifference in his sentiments. Yet he lov'd her all this while, and sometimes even unto fury; but after all, there were times in which his passion lay hid, and wherein he was willing to find occasion to complain. During one of those intervals of his Love and his absence, the Elegy I am going to repeat to you was made.

ELEGY.

Hence, dismal melancholy from my breast,
Which hast too long my quiet dispossess.
Those pangs I feel, I can no longer bear:
My pleasures past but cause my present fear.
And my afflicted Soul, since hope is gone,
Sees and presages nought but griefs to come;
Griefs, which distract me, and continue still
To murder daily what they cannot kill.
Love! cruel Love! the source of all my tears;
Unhappy they in whom thy power appears.
But happy he, in whose untroubled breast
No storms of Love disturb his Halcyon rest;
And jealousy and rage that with it go.
We should not then by dear experience see,
What fits of heat and cold in Love there be;
How near the brink of death and dire despair, Th'imagin'd sweets of Love and pleasure are:
Nor those eternal torments should we know,
Which who least merits most shall undergo.
'Tis true, a sad and cold indifference Makes us behold the World with negligence;
That without love there no desires can be,
Without desires too, no felicitie.
That even with fortune we are drunk; and cloy'd
With plenty, which by surfeit is enjoy'd.
But 'tis a poor and despicable grief,
So light, from tears it seeks for no relief.
Slight cares, which the wild notes of birds allay,
And purling streams that o'er the pebbles play.
But yet that jewel liberty is kept,
And the lull'd Soul of too quick sense bereft.
The headlong passions bush'd in careless dreams,
Fall from the force of their too fierce extremes.
Then 'tis the pleasure of the day's our own,
The glorious Sun, and all he shines upon.
But yet is this a life depriv'd of love;
And can the Soul a greater torment prove,
Than not to love, or not belov'd to be,
And all its passions circumscrib'd to see
Within it self? without the joy to know
The price of sighs and tears that gently flow;
Of amorous regards and thousand charms
That change to pleasures, griefs most fierce alarms?
Ev'n sorrows have their pleasures, tears their time
Of joy: Vain Fools, that think sweet love a crime.
A constant love will still a vertue be.
Then let us Daphnis still affect, though he
All cool and temperate, with equal fires,
Meets not my flames; my more refin'd desires
Feed on those pleasures which my love inspires.
Wretch that I am! but is it just my love
On swifter measure than his passion move?
Suffering such ills his careless heart can ne'er Resent, that heart which ought those ills to share:
Whom duty binds for me alone to live,
And no just cause for my complaints to give.
He that a thousand solemn Oaths hath sworn,
He knew no bliss, but only to adore;
That time and age should find him still the same,
His heart for ever burning in my flame;

Nor

Nor should his passion ever know an end,
 Or any else to love so well pretend:
 Yet this ingrate my absence can support,
 Whilst my weak spirit makes its last effort,
 To bear his want; would he my sorrows weigh,
 Obdurate as he is, he could not stay.
 But judging Elismena's heart by his,
 He ne'er can understand her miseries.
 Insensible, he never feels my woe;
 Though yet, methinks, he cannot chuse but know
 The griefs I bear; careless of my complaint, Perhaps he makes a Court to some new Saint.
 His absence shows he must inconstant be;
 That day, kind powers, let me never see.
 Obliging fate first end my days, before
 I hear the perjurd Daphnis loves no more.
 Away fond jealousy; he cannot prove
 A faithless lover to a faithful love.
 An amorous heart can ne'er forego its chains;
 Since for his sake I suffer amorous pains.
 Daphnis, my causeless jealousy forgive.
 Daphnis for me, and I for him do live.
 Our faith shall late posterity approve,
 And ours shall be the measure of their love.
 Yet (spight of hope) suspicion and despair,
 By turns my hearts divided Empire share.
 But still those chagrins, doubts, despair, and fears,
 Injurious words, hard thoughts, and sighs and tears
 Are loves effects, and with one voice they cry, Daphnis, for thee, Daphnis, for thee I dye.

As soon as Lucia had done repeating these Verses to Plotina, Ha! Lucia (said this amiable Virgin) if you think you have hurt Martius by repeating these Verses to me, you are mistaken; for, I find them so dear and passionate, that I am perswaded he that could inspire a very excellent person with such amorous sentiments, must needs be such himself, and one that knows how to love; for such Verses as these would never have been made for an indifferent. How? Plotina (cry'd Lucia) can you reason in this manner? and esteem a man, who has been capable of changing his sentiments, and having only a faint and languishing affection for a rare person whom he ardently lov'd, and by whom he was always dearly affected? For a person, I say, who had absolutely given him her heart, and who (as you may see by the Verses I have recited to you) had the most tender sentiments in the world for this inconstant Lover? Be it how it will (said Plotina) I cannot place a Lover who ceases to have an ardent love, in the rank of inconstants. If you account him not in that rank (answer'd Lucia) then you must reckon him amongst the perfidious; for as I conceive, 'tis perfidiousness to cease to love a person who always loves you with the same ardency. For my part (said I) I am perswaded all change may be term'd inconstancy; and though a man become not servant to another Mistress, yet if he cease to love the first without cause, he is inconstant. I know not very well (reply'd Plotina) whether according to exact reason, that which you say be inconstancy; but I know the custome of the world calls such a man as Lycastes unconstant, who has lov'd several Mistresses one after another, and sometimes several together; but such a one as Martius is not so term'd, who has only diminish'd his diligences. But would you like well (said Lucia) that Martius should cease to love, after you had married him? I should not (answer'd she) but I conceive the Lovers who cease to be such after they have married their Mistresses, are not always in fault; for indeed most women, when they are married, are negligent, refractory, and perverse towards their husbands, and many times too guilty of levity and causeless jealousy. So that it is not to be wonder'd, if the husband finding them so different from what they were before marriage, change their sentiments towards them. Flatter your self, Plotina, flatter your self (said Lucia with some earnestness) 'tis the custome of all fair and young persons to believe their charms will have more power than those of others; but let me tell you once more; Martius is an inconstant person, and more dangerous than Lycastes. In truth, Lucia (answer'd Plotina) I do not much fear either of them, for marriage is so much fear'd by me, that I hope that thought will help me to defend my heart against the merit of these two Rivals, and I dare say too, against any light inclination I have for Martius.

Thus you see what Plotina's sentiments were; and how she defended Martius to the disadvantage of Lycastes. In the mean time they both lov'd her extremely passionately; nevertheless, they durst not declare it openly to her: but without having such design, they did this office one for another, although there was now as great a secret hatred between them as there had been formerly friendship. For it hapned one day that these two Lovers were in a garden amongst many other persons of Quality, and both of them by the instinct of their affections endeavour'd to approach to Plotina: but Lucia meeting them fell into discourse with Martius, that so she might oblige Lycastes whose friend she was. On the other side a Kinswoman of Martius observing the cunning of Lucia, made as if she had some important affair to speak to Lycastes about; so that these two Rivals were alike unhappy for more than an hour; but at length Martius quitting himself something rudely from the conversation of Lucia, came to find Plotina with whom I was walking and another of my Friends: but being the walk we were in was very narrow, Martius soon became alone with his Mistress; for I stopt to entertain that friend I mention'd, though we stay'd still in the same Walk. Plotina being of a very pleasant humor, at first fell to tell Martius several divertising things she had observ'd in the company. For my part (said he maliciously to her) I have seen nothing more remarkable, than Lycastes so employ'd in speaking to a friend of mine in a place where the amiable Plotina is present. But perhaps (answer'd she smiling) Lycastes does not talk to your Friend, but your Friend to Lycastes. Be it how it will (reply'd Martius) if he lov'd you as much as he would have you believe, he would be as incivil to the Lady who entertains him, as I was but now to Lucia who held me in discourse. But to speak truth (added he) profess'd inconstants, such as Lycastes, have no violent affections. But who told you Lycastes is in love with me? (demanded Plotina) I have not perceiv'd it. Being I know no person whatsoever (answer'd Martius) who does not or has not lov'd you; I suppose a man who is accusom'd to love, out of inconstancy only, cannot fail but love the most charming person in the World. And moreover, amiable Plotina (added he) the eyes of a Rival, and a constant Rival, discover things much better than those of other people. I assure you (reply'd she making as if she did not hear Martius)

I have not perceiv'd that Lycastes loves me more than the other Ladies he converses with. However (answer'd Martius) I know if he does love, he will not love you very long, for it is not possible for him to love the same person any considerable time: and I remember I have heard he once writ to a Lady in the Country to desire a private conference with her; but when the answer arriv'd, and permission to go see and speak with her in private was granted him, he had no longer any thing to say to her, because he had chang'd his sentiments towards her. Ha! Martius (cry'd Plotina, blushing, as if she had been angry it could be believ'd that any one could not love her long) that which you say can never come to pass.

Then I am very miserable, Madam (answer'd Martius) by being out of all hope ever to be cur'd of the ill which torments me. But where had you those two Verses which denounce to me not only that I shall love you as long as I live, but always have not one but a thousand Rivals as dangerous as Lycastes? I assure you (reply'd she) they came into my mind without thinking of them, and I spoke them unawares; for I would have you know (added she, minding to turn the discourse into rallery) I do not at all pretend to Poetry; but to speak truth, I could not allow you to believe that I cannot keep a heart when I have conquer'd it. And besides (continued she smiling) I take so little care in conquering them, that I am something jealous of my power. After this, she stood still and call'd me; so Martius could discourse with her no longer, but was oblig'd to go and entertain himself with other Ladies. By this time Lycastes, having disengag'd himself from her that talkt with him, came to us, and that so opportunely, that Plotina going to pass over a little Bridge which lay cross a Brook, gave him her hand, and so he continued leading her afterwards. Being a person infinitely ingenious, and subtle to prejudice a Rival, I know not (said he to Plotina looking upon her) whether the conversation you have had with Martius, was very divertising, but he talkt with you in a place, where what passion soever he has for you, he ought rather to have sigh'd out of grief than love; for I have been told, that the first time the fair and charming person whom he destroy'd declar'd she was very willing he should love her, it was in this very place, where perhaps he entertain'd you with the love he has for you. I know not whether Martius loves me or no (answer'd Plotina) but I know how to make my self so much respected as that none dare speak any thing to me but what I am willing to hear. What? Madam (cry'd he) can you eternally hinder such as adore you from declaring it to you? No, no, (added he) if Martius has not yet told you he loves you, he ought to have done it. But I confess to you, that to prove to you, that he knows how to love, it behov'd him to entertain you only with sad discourse in this place. I beseech you (said Plotina) tell me in what place of the World you have had opportunity to speak of Love, and have not done it? you, I say, who are accus'd of having made a thousand declarations of love! But, Madam (answer'd he) I have lov'd only women that did not love me; but as for Martius, he has been lov'd again, and lov'd constantly, and the abatement of his affection has caus'd the death of the person whom he lov'd so much. As for what you say (reply'd Plotina) that you have never been lov'd again, it is not much to be wonder'd at, for you do not give your Mistresses leisure to love you. Ha! As for you, amiable Plotina (cry'd he) I promise to give you all the leisure you can desire; for I perceive I shall love you as long as I live. If it be so (answer'd she smiling) I shall not be much displeas'd, because it will give me occasion to revenge all those that you have deserted, and to manifest that there may be eternal rigour as well as eternal love. Plotina spoke this with a certain deriding air, which sensibly afflicted Lycastes, so that he could speak to her no more all the rest of the day, because she joyn'd and continued with the rest of the company. After that time Martius and Lycastes neglected nothing which they thought fit to do, to please Plotina; yet they continu'd a civil respect one towards another, because they knew she desir'd it, and nevertheless us'd all artifices to their mutual disadvantage. Lycastes knowing Lucia had several Letters of Martius to his first Mistress, and from her to him, importun'd her to shew them to Plotina, as she had the Elegy before. And accordingly Lucia going to visit her one afternoon, and finding her alone, acted so cunningly that she made her curious to see the Letters she pretended to have. I will shew you them (said Lucia to Plotina) but if you profit no better by them than by the Elegy which you have seen already, no doubt I shall repent of it. For is there any thing more ignoble, than after the death of a person infinitely amiable, and infinitely vertuous, to see the most secret testimonies of her affection become publick through his negligence who receiv'd them? I confess (said Plotina) if people could always think of being liable to this danger, they would never write any thing but what might be seen by all the World; but the mischief, at the time such obliging Letters are pen'd, they have so good an opinion of them to whom they are written, that they fear not the falling out of such a misadventure. There are some women no doubt who write all that they think, through the reason you mention (answer'd Lucia) but there are others, who out of natural imprudence and the desire to have flattering and courting Letters, write not to one alone but to many men, and spend one half of their lives in writing Love-letters, and the other in receiving those of their gallants. There are some too that know how to disguise their hands several ways, and others who never write in their own, that so they may deny all when they please. As for these women (said Plotina) I allow that their Letters be shewn to all the World, for certainly they are not worthy to be discreetly dealt withal. But as for a vertuous person, in whose heart is nothing but an innocent affection, 'tis inhumanity to publish such things of theirs as may be ill interpreted. Yet this comes to pass so frequently, that I think to refrain from writing any thing too kind, 'tis best to forbear to love; for prudence is not much listened to by such as love, and distrust is so contrary to perfect love, that scarce any thing which is not criminal can be refus'd to a person that is lov'd. I believe also, that the more an affection is innocent, the more the Letters are obliging; for they that rely on their own innocence, write with more liberty: therefore to avoid being expos'd to such a great unhappiness, and to forbear writing, it is requisite for me (as I said before) to keep my self from loving. But that I may be confirm'd in this sentiment (added she) shew me in what manner Martius writ to Lyssimira, and how Lyssimira writ to Martius. I will

Madam

Madam (said Lucia) and the better to manifest to you how deceitful or inconstant men are; I will shew you Letters written at divers times, from Martius to Lysimira. See here then a Letter which Martius writ to Lysimira some time after she had permitted him to love her, and he had requested some slight favour of her which she refus'd him, at which he seem'd angry, and left her rudely. And so Lucia read to Plotina that which I am going to read to you, for I kept copies of all Martius's Letters, because they appear'd to me very amorous.

Martius to Lysimira.

I Do not defer, Madam, to acknowledge, repent of, and beseech your pardon for my fault, till you reproach me for it. I have offended, I confess, I am culpable, I cannot plead any thing in excuse of my capricio, but excess of love. For who am I, Madam, that I should not be contented that the divine Lysimira knows I love her, though she give me no testimony of an affection equal to my own? Have I deserv'd the other kindnesses you have had for me? would not a thousand persons of greater merit than I be satisfied with the condition you permit me to enjoy? Alas! I cannot deny it: But, I beseech you Madam, be not offended with me, and add not more rigorous and cruel punishments to those I cause to my self. If ever person lov'd more tenderly, more respectfully and more ardently than I, I am willing that you refuse the pardon to me which I desire of you: but since that cannot be, grant it me, Madam, and believe I shall with eternal fidelity own the command you have laid upon me to be faithful. Yet I cannot divine wherefore you recommended it more to me the other day than at any time before; but can you divine that I am more so this day, than ever I was in my life? when you tell me your secret, I will tell you mine. But, alas! when shall I have the joy to speak to you? I know I shall this day have the honour to see you, but in a place where I can do nothing less than entertain you with my love. Pity me therefore, Madam, pity me, and imagine how great a torment it would be to you, if you were oblig'd to hide the most violent and innocent passion in the World.

I confess (said Plotina) Martius's Letter is very amorous, and 'tis hard to conceive how a man that writ in this manner, could cease to love without cause. See this other Letter (answer'd Lucia) for 'tis something more passionate than the first: and accordingly Plotina read this following.

Martius to Lysimira.

How I love you, Madam! what an amiable person you are! and from how great pains has your Letter of this morning deliver'd me! What can I do to repay you as much joy as it has given me? Tell me, Madam; for if no more but dying for your service be requisite, I will not refuse it. Nothing can equal the delight of being lov'd by the most excellent person of the World; and being I love you as I do, I am sometimes extremely sorry, you cannot receive a pleasure equal to mine. But I beseech you, Madam, let this pleasure accompany me to the grave, let Fortune never ravish it from me, but make her learn there is a felicity greater than all she can give, over which she has no power. In acknowledgment of such a multiply'd goodness, Madam, there is nothing which I refuse, not even the constraining of the violent passion I have in my soul, though it be altogether innocent, if at least it be any thing displeasing to you. Let us not then afflict our selves before the time; Fortune perhaps will favour our love, and we shall not be so unhappy as you apprehend. And though we should, you know what I told you in the beginning of my passion; I am not now capable of denying, that it is the most predominant of all my faculties, and is to me in stead both of soul and life; Only love Martius, who will be eternally yours, in spite of all obstacles in the World; and let his great love Madam supply his want of merit: pardon him if he dares speak to you of the goodness of the divine Lysimira, he does not therefore esteem himself less unworthy of it; and this confidence diminishes nothing of his respect, though it infinitely augments his love.

Ha! Lucia (cry'd Plotina) I will not have Martius write to me; for certainly he writes too passionately and too well for me; but I beseech you shew me one of Lysimira's Letters. I am going to shew something more (said Lucia) for I will let you see the Verses she made during Martius's absence, who a little while before he departed gave her a flourishing Myrtle set in one of those earthen pots which are so admirably made at Rome. For using to entertain her melancholy near that Myrtle, to which she address'd thus.

Fair Myrtle, often water'd with my tears;
Fair Myrtle, witness of my griefs and fears;
Upon thy wounded Bark let Daphnis see An heart more wounded than thy Bark can be.
Tell him what fears my Love-sick heart have rent;
What griefs I suffer'd since my Daphnis went;
Tell him I feel whatever torments Love,
And join'd with absence, strong desires can move.
Then if thou canst my amorous flames express,
May happy Lovers characters still bless Thy sacred Rinde; no tears be ever known
To water thee, but what Heaven sheds alone.

These Verses are undoubtedly of a very passionate strain (said Plotina) but how came they to Martius's hands?

hands? At the return of this Lover (answer'd Plotina) he found the excellent Lyfimira had so favourably spoken of him during his absence, that all her other Lovers were jealous of him. So that the first time that he visited her, this amiable person was attacked with railery by some of the company in his presence. Which at first she put off very pleasantly; but, truth being a thing of powerful operation, she was at length constrain'd to pretend she had forgot something in her Closet, that so the disturbance of her mind might not be observ'd in her countenance. On which occasion Martius desiring to speak a few words to her, follow'd her and jesting with her, as he was going, because she could not endure the railery made to her. But as he follow'd her, he took up these Verses which she had let fall unwillingly; and to getting them without her knowledge, he folded them up, and did not read them till the evening. You may imagine what joy they gave him, and the next morning he writ Lyfimira the following Letter.

Martius to Lyfimira.

THe jealousy of many Friends and Rivals, has no other effect, Madam, but increases my love; and my joy is great beyond expression, when I consider I possess a heart, in which so many illustrious persons esteem me happy to have a place; a heart, the most generous and noble in the world. Ah! Madam, is not this too much for Martius? Yet I swear to you he had rather dy than be content with less, and should infallibly dye, if any other could have as much honour as he. No, Madam, that unhappiness shall never befall me, your admirable Verses assure me of it, and I cannot forbear to give a thousand kisses to those favourable testimonies of the tenderness of your heart. Should I undertake to render you the most humble thanks I owe you, it would be impossible for me. I shall only tell you, or to speak better, I shall swear to you, that I will eternally love the divine Lyfimira, but so as she desires and deserves to be lov'd. Moreover, to return you two Verses in stead of your own, which I account for a hundred thousand, be pleas'd to know that whilst my journey lasted, I said a hundred and a hundred times.

Mine is immutable by time or place.*

Ha! Lucia (cri'd Plotina) I can no longer believe Martius loves me, because whatever you say, I cannot think he has ceas'd to love Lyfimira, as dead as she is. Yet you see him very pleasant in your presence (answer'd Lucia) had but he been unfaithful only to the ashes of Lyfimira, the practice of vulgar Lovers might be alledg'd to excuse him. But, in fine, after a thousand Letters more obliging than those I have shew'd you, his love could insensibly abate, though he continu'd civil to her. But certainly by becoming happy he absolutely ceas'd to be a Lover; and since the loss of Lyfimira, which notwithstanding he sensibly regretted, then, you see your eyes have afforded him sufficient consolation. In good earnest, Lucia (said Plotina) you are a cruel person, and I will be reveng'd upon Lycastes for all the mischief which you do to Martius. You will be unjust if you do so (answer'd Lucia.) Believe me (reply'd Plotina smiling) injustice is something agreeable in certain occasions. However, I declare to you (added she) I will see no more of those Letters, for they would force me either to love or hate Martius, and I am resolv'd to do neither. There is no great resemblance between those two passions (added Lucia.) I grant it (answer'd Plotina) but yet I feel my mind capable of both. That you may avoid both (reply'd Lucia, smiling) love the poor Lycastes, who adores you, and have only indifference for Martius, who has too much merit to be hated; and too little constancy, to be lov'd. As for Lycastes (answer'd Plotina) I declare to you that I can neither love nor hate him; for he is too agreeable a person to cause hatred, and too inconstant to excite my love. If it be so (said Lucia) infallibly you will love Martius. I should be very sorry then (answer'd Plotina) for I desire to love nothing but honour, my friends, and my self. They that love themselves well (reply'd Lucia) sometimes love others too for their own sakes. I assure you (answer'd Plotina) I am persuaded that such as understand their own interests well, affect no person in the way of love; but as for friendship, our lives would be irksome without it. 'Tis so difficult to have Friends at your age (reply'd Lucia) that you are very prone to have disguis'd Lovers, and be of the humor of those women who are not offended but with appearances, and admit of love under the name of friendship. For my part (said Plotina) I am not oblig'd to examine the hearts of my Friends so narrowly, provided they tell me nothing that displeases me. But I am not gone so far yet (added she) and but hitherto I have had only acquaintances, and would not yet make choice of Friends. Nevertheless I perceive my heart inclin'd to have some; and if my reason did not oppose it, I should have one already. However (said Lucia) take heed of the disguised Lovers I speak of, for there is nothing more agreeable or more dangerous than a lover that resembles a Friend. I shall endeavour to make use of your Counsels (answer'd Plotina.)

Thus you see, Amilcar, how the mind of this amiable Virgin stood affected towards her two Lovers. The next day after this conversation, Martius hapning to be at a Walking where Plotina was, and from which Lycastes was absent, found an opportunity to speak to her a little more openly of his love than he had done. At first Plotina rejected him with sufficient rigour; No, no, Martius (said she to him) do not conceive that your merit shall hinder me from forbidding you to speak to me of your pretended passion; for if you love me not, you do me an injury to tell me so; and if you do, I have such a respect for you, as not to cherish you in a fruitless hope. But, do you think, Madam (answer'd he) 'tis in your power to extinguish the passion you have excited in me, or so much as to hinder me from hoping? Love is far more capricious than you imagine (added he) it entertains hope against reason; and you attempt in vain to keep me from believing that one day you will love me, whether you will or no. Yes, Madam, the greatness of my passion, and my perseverance will infallibly mollify your heart. There is much boldness in your words (reply'd Plotina;) I assure you, Madam (answer'd he).

he) there is more love than boldness, since I trust only in the greatness of my passion. But, Martius (said Plotina) think you I can ever love a man that could cease to love a very amiable person, by whom he was ardently lov'd? Who told you, Madam (said he) I ever ceas'd to love the charming person whom I have lost? All the World (answer'd she) and besides, I gather it by my own observance; for if you had not ceas'd to love her, you would love nothing but your grief. Ha! Madam (cri'd Martius sighing) why will you force me to reveal a secret to you which I had resolv'd never to discover? I assure you (answer'd Plotina) I have no intention to force you to tell me any thing of private concernment. Yet you force me to it (repli'd Martius) by reproaching me that I have ceas'd to love the person whom I have lost, thereby to have a pretext to forbid me to love you. Nevertheless it is certain, if I had not lov'd her beyond the grave, perhaps I should not have been your Lover. But, Madam, believe me upon my word, without obliging me to give you a particular account of things. Plotina being then sufficiently curious to know what Martius meant, treated him so fiercely, that he became constrain'd to tell her more than he was otherwise willing to do. I beseech you charming Plotina (said he to her) hearken to an unhappy person who adores you. Yet I find much regret to relate what I am going to inform you of; for I must renew all my sorrows, and cannot avoid bringing my self into danger of being suspected of vanity and little discretion. Know then, that I was undoubtedly lov'd by Lyfsmira, who was one of the most amiable persons in the World; and I can swear to you, I have not ceas'd to love her a moment; 'tis true, after our affection was ratifi'd by a thousand Oaths, I chang'd my deportment towards her, because decency and her self requir'd it: but as for my heart, it continu'd immutable. Nevertheless (such was my unhappiness) Lyfsmira believ'd Lucia had formerly not hated me, and did not hate me still; so that by degrees she came to be possess'd with a secret jealousy which destroy'd her. How? (interrupted Plotina) has Lucia, whom I know, lov'd you, and does she love you still? At present (answer'd Martius) I believe Lucia hates me, but at that time Lyfsmira believ'd she did not, and fear'd I lov'd her, though 'tis most certain my affection to her was no more but a certain civility which a sincere man may dispense with where he thinks he is not hated. In the mean time Lyfsmira being willing to dissemble her discontent, and keep me from conversing with Lucia alone, chose rather to see her every day though she hated her, than not to see her and be in fear lest I visited her in private; so that she became inseparable from Lucia. I will not stay to tell you, Madam, how great discontents the poor Lyfsmira endur'd, without communicating any thing to me (for she had a great mind, and car'd not to complain) and how great disquiets I caus'd her innocently by the civility I shew'd to Lucia, who as you know, has a very commendable Wit. 'Tis sufficient to signify to you, that Lyfsmira by little and little became very languishing and melancholy. At which I was much afflicted, and enquiring the cause of her, I understood her mind was as sick as her body. I entreated her, I begg'd her to let me know the cause of her discontent; but she would never tell it me. The Gods are witnesses, I omitted nothing I believ'd might please, cure or comfort her. I did one thing too of no small difficulty; for having at length understood by an intimate friend of Lyfsmira the true cause of her sadness, I never saw

Lucia but when I could not avoid it, and I gave her all the assurances of my affection I could express. But (to her own unhappiness) she doubted the sincerity of my Oaths, and fell into a sickness which shortly after ended her days; at her death she persisted in her jealousy to her last breath, and left me written with her own hand in the Tablets which her Friend gave me after her decease, the sad words which I am going to recite to you.

'I have liv'd enough Martius; since I have testifi'd to you that I lov'd you more than my life; But if I have had any power over you, use your utmost endeavours to marry Plotina when time shall have dry'd up your tears. She is the only person whom I can suffer to succeed me in your heart. Do not refuse me this last favour which I desire of you. And if you cannot win her affection whom I have nam'd to you, love nothing but my memory, I conjure you.

But, Martius (said Plotina) can this which you speak be true? I will let you see it, Madam, when you please (answer'd Martius sighing) I assure my self (added he) you conceive well the unfortunate Lyfsmira design'd principally to hinder me from loving Lucia, by commanding me to use my utmost endeavours to marry you; for she did not know you intimately. But she needed not to fear it; for considering Lucia as the cause (though innocent) of Lyfsmira's death, I went no more to visit her after I had lost that amiable person, whom I regretted with a sensibility of heart which I am not able to express. Indeed I resolv'd never to love any person more; and though she had commanded me to do what I could to marry you, yet I made a determination to be faithful to her ashes, spend the rest of my days with very great indifference. But (as destiny is inevitable) after time had diminish'd my grief, your beauty, the charms of your mind, and a thousand agreeable qualities which all the World admires in you, dispos'd my heart to obey Lyfsmira; so that finding my duty conjoyn'd with my inclination, I have lov'd you, and I love you both for the sake of Lyfsmira and your own. And judge now, charming Plotina, whether I am an unfaithful Lover; for I swear to you with all the sincerity of a man of honour, that besides your self I should never have lov'd any thing but the ashes of Lyfsmira; and unless Lyfsmira had permitted me to love you, I should have so timely oppos'd the passion I have for you, that perhaps it would not have overpower'd my reason. Moreover, one unhappiness there befel me which afflicted me sensibly; for amidst the disorder whereinto Lyfsmira's death had brought my reason, I was rob'd of a Casket, in which Lyfsmira and I had put all that we had written to one another, because she durst not keep my Letters: and for my part, I have ever believ'd Lucia caus'd it to be stoln from me, that so I might be depriv'd of everything which should put me in remembrance of Lyfsmira. I express'd so great sorrow for this loss, that my intimate Friends know well that I am not an unfaithful person. Martius related this with so passionate an air; and so like a man that spoke truth; that the novelty of this adventure made a sufficient impression upon Plotina's mind. She call'd to mind then all that Lucia had said to her against Martius, and in favour of Lycastes; so that not doubting but that it proceeded from the secret inclination she always had for Martius, Plotina became a little less severe to this Lover. Nevertheless she did not permit him to love her, but yet did not so absolutely forbid him as to make him despair of obtaining her permission one day. And accordingly he us'd

So much care to please Plotina, that she suffer'd him sometimes to tell her something of the sentiments he had for her; which yet was always in such a manner as engag'd her to nothing; for being of a merry humor, she easily evades all difficulties. Now after her conversation with Martius, Lucia became wholly out of her favour; and whereas she conceal'd nothing from me which befel him, she told me all she had learnt from Martius, and I perceiv'd by the air with which she spoke, that this Lover was happier than he thought. Not that Plotina had a great passion in her heart, but he had always the advantage to be better thought of than any of his Rivals: and therefore she told me he was her first Friend. In the mean time Lycastes was very unhappy, and if Lucia had not comforted him, and continually encourag'd him with hope, I believe he would have cur'd himself. But this person designing to serve Lycastes, chiefly that she might prejudice Martius, omitted nothing to bring her purpose to pass; for though Plotina lov'd her no longer, yet out of prudence she continu'd to visit her. Martius became more chearful as he became more happy; so that he took care every day only to give Plotina new divertisements. Nevertheless, he was sometimes discontented to see he made no more progress in the heart of this fair person: but the unhappiness of Lycastes was a very efficacious consolation to him. About this time divers pleasant things fell out; but because I do not love long narrations, I will shorten this as much as I can. Yet, I must not omit to tell you, that Plotina and Martius having laid a Wager, my Friend lost, and gave Martius a very pretty Seal, which he receiv'd with joy; but how careful soever he was to keep it, he dropt it once as he was walking in a Meadow with some Ladies; but it was his happiness that I found it again and restor'd it to him. Some days after he lost the Writing-Tablets which I gave him, and which had been Plotina's; but he was so happy as that Plotina found them and return'd them to him; but she sent him these Verses with them which had reference to a conversation they had together the day before, in which Plotina maintain'd that a lost friendship might be reviv'd, but never a lost Love for the same person. The Verses were these,

*'Tis true, good fortune is your constant friend,
And what you lose, still back again doth send.
Howe'er 'tis fit henceforth more care you show;
Remember that Plotina told you so.
For if an Heart in Love's Realm goes astray, Poor Heart, 'tis lost for ever and a day.*

Martius answer'd to this gallantly, with very much wit; but because I do not well remember either his Verses or his Letter, I will not attempt to repeat them to you. Shortly after, being these Verses were not made any secret, they made Lycastes so jealous, that he quarrell'd with Martius; and that in so high a degree, that it came to a Duel. So they fought, and were both wounded; Martius, but slightly, but Lycastes so dangerously, that it was presently judg'd he would die. Whereupon, though he had been the Challenger, Martius was forc'd to flee from Ardea, and that without bidding adieu to Plotina, who would not grant him a private conference. So that he was fain to be contented with writing to her, and receiving only an Answer of some Lines. Some days after his departure, Lycastes dy'd without being lamented by any of his Mistresses excepting Plotina, who pitied him, and was very sorry he dy'd, chiefly because his death banish'd Martius. During his absence, he writ very diligently to Plotina: but being Lucia knew that in love, absence is the fittest time to prejudice a Lover, especially when it is long, and the Mistress is very young, and loves mirth and pleasures, she did not despair of being able at length to ruine Martius in the heart of Plotina. Now it hapned that a Brother of hers returning from a long Voyage, and having seen Martius for some time in the place which he chose for his retreat, she oblig'd him to gratifie her by committing a wickedness. He was young, and of no very good nature; he did not love Martius neither, he delighted to cause disturbances, he did not hate lying, and had lov'd Plotina a little from his Childhood: Wherefore Lucia having plotted with him what he should say concerning Martius, he came to make me his first visit; and being told I sat for my picture that day to give it to Plotina, he came to the place where I was; but because it was at the house of no ordinary Painter, and the Conversation which was made there chang'd Plotina's mind toward Martius, I must tell you something concerning that excellent man.

His reputation (said Amilcar) has no doubt arriv'd at me; for if I am not deceiv'd, he is a man that makes pictures in black and white Crayon, and in little, and his name is Nelanthus. 'Tis the very same (answer'd Cesonia). But is it possible for such pictures (said Amilcar) to be as like & as lively as those that are drawn in colours? I assure you (answer'd Cesonia) a Looking-glass does not more exactly represent those, it reflects, than the Crayons of this excellent man; for he dives into the very hearts of people, to animate their pictures. He makes their minds and humors visible, he expresses even the least motions of their souls in their eyes, the smallest observable Action does not escape him; he preserves too the perfect resemblance of the cloathing, with his black and white he makes brown hair distinguishable from fair, lively colors from pale complexions; and, in fine, all his portraits are inimitable: he knows so well how to dispose light and shadows, and so perfectly represents the air and life with his Pencils, that all the skilful in Painture are amaz'd at his work. The heads he makes are so round (or rising) that the eyes are mistaken in them, and they are drawn with a certain softness which so admirably imitates Nature, that he cannot be sufficiently commended. As for his person, Nelanthus is tall, well proportioned, and of a good presence; he speaks well of every thing, he delights those he draws with the variety of his discourse; he loves ingenuity extreamly, and has written the precepts of his Art very commendably. Moreover, he makes very agreeable and exquisite Verses, when he draws a person that pleases him, and whom he would commend; but which is strange, at the same time he makes his admirable Crayons, which deserve to be admir'd by all the world, he talks with the same jollity and freedom of mind, as if he had nothing to do but to divert the company; and nevertheless there is nothing more handsome and exact than that which he is doing. And therefore he has drawn all the persons of high quality, illustrious and learned in Italy. And this is the man at whose house I was one day with Plotina to sit for my picture, when Lucia's Brother I told you of came to find me. Being it is an usual custom to make questions to a man who comes from a long voyage, I set my self to enquire divers things of Celius (for so is Lucia's Brother call'd) but Plotina having a secret design, sign, made mockery of my demands, and counsell'd Celins not to answer me at all; or if he did, not to tell me the truth. For indeed (said she to him) me thinks there is nothing more troublesome than to be oblig'd to give an account of your Travels, to every one that you meet. For is there any thing more tedious than to meet such people as desire to know even the least Circumstances of the Country which you have seen, who expect you should know the difference between the Pismires of Egypt (so fam'd for bigness) and the Pismires of Italy, and who raising questions upon questions know not wherefore they would know that which they enquire of. But for my part, who care neither for the Elephants of Asia, the Pismires of Egypt, nor the Crocodiles of Nilus; I will only ask Celins whether the women of Italy are as lovely as those he has seen elsewhere; and whether the honest men of this Country do not equal those of other. Being to speak to the two most charming persons in the world (answer'd Celins) I have not liberty to say there are any elsewhere that equal them; but if I were to speak in another place, having first excepted you, I would freely acknowledge that the Greek Ladies have something very attractive, and that their glances are so amiable, that his heart cannot see them much without loving them, unless the heart be otherwise pre-engag'd. Then you have lov'd some Greek beauty? (reply'd I.) Having been so long absent (answer'd he) 'tis easie to imagine that I cannot but have lov'd in some place of the world; for certainly people become amorous more easily in other Countries than in their own; for such as are absent, are always free from business; and idleness is a great preparative to love. Yet I know some Absents (reply'd I looking upon Plotina) who I dare swear are not amorous in the place of their banishment. In truth (said she, blushing) that is not to be spoken so affirmatively; for few know how to deport themselves in absence as they ought. And yet I know nothing more obliging than to do as I mean. But to speak truth, I do not find many persons but who accustom themselves to dispense with seeing such as they love best. Which nevertheless is that which would displease me most of any thing in the world (added she) for as many as I esteem, I am confident time could not accustom me to want patiently the sight of a person whom I lov'd much, but I should be always more sad and carelessly dress'd, desire his presence every moment, have no delight in those very places where others find most, and every day would encrease my melancholy. For all this, we usually see, two days after a Lover is out of his Mistress's sight, he is comforted, he decks himself as formerly, he walks, converses, diverts himself, every day less remembers the person he loves, and is no longer afflicted than while he is writing to her. I confess (answer'd Celins) most men do thus; but you must confess too that most women comfort themselves as speedily as men. I confess it sincerely (said Plotina) but according to the humor I am of, if I were so unhappy as to love one of those contented or comforted Absents (if I may so speak) and knew it, I should so well comfort my self with his loss, that perhaps I should in time render him incapable of Consolation; for most of such absent persons speak at their return, as if they had been all the while the most miserable men in the world. 'Tis true (said Nelanthus then continuing his work too) most part of Travellers are great Lyars; for one day I saw an absent Lover who oblig'd me to copy in little, a great picture of his Mistress whom he left at Volaterra, whence he was. And being he took some pleasure in seeing me work, he came very frequently to visit me; and I remember one day among the rest, I beheld him very merry. He related sundry diversifements to me, at which he had been present in the preceeding days; he sung, he made pleasant Verses upon a picture which I had drawn, as I did also in my turn, and feign'd my self an African to divert him and my self; after which, he remembring it was the day on which to write to Volaterra, he ask'd me what he should write about. When he had half-done his Letter, one came to seek him to go to a walking appointment; whereupon he left his Letter half-finish'd, and went to walk with certain Ladies, without minding the finishing of his Letter, though he could not have the like opportunity till four days after. When he was gone I took the Letter which he had begun, and withal, I confess I read it. But I was surpriz'd to find that he was writing to his Mistress, as the most sad, melancholy and afflicted man in the world by reason of his absence. For he told her, he avoided the world, took pleasure in nothing, and led the most irksom life that ever was. And which was rare, at his return from the walk he came to my house again, and without thinking of his Letter, desir'd me to lay aside the picture I had begun, and the next morning to begin that of one of the Ladies he had been walking with that afternoon. And therefore ever since, I have not given much credit to the Letters of absent persons. For my part (said Celins) I never yet saw an absent person long melancholy. Yet I know one (answer'd I) whom you cannot have seen very chearful; for being he is banisht about an unhappy affair, I imagine you must have found him sad. I perceive (reply'd Celins) you mean Martius; but since they report (added he maliciously) his heart is a Conquest which the amiable Plotina has rejected, I shall not fear to say that I have seen a fair person in the place where he is who boasts of being greatly lov'd by him. I say, who boasts, because she is a woman, that easily enough publishes the Conquests which she makes. They who boast so easily of taking hearts (said Plotina blushing) seem not to understand the art of conquering them. Be it how it will (answer'd he) she shew'd some very pleasant Letters, and I stole one from her without her perceiving it. Martius writes so well (reply'd Plotina) that I have a great curiosity to see some of his Letters, especially concerning love, for I have not seen any. Celins seeing Plotina's mind so dispos'd as he desir'd, shew'd her accordingly a Love-Letter of Martius which Lucia had given him, for she had a hundred in her keeping which had no names to them. So that Plotina knowing Martius's his hand and stile, believ'd he was inconstant, and did not suspect Lucia of this guile of Celins. Wherefore being of quick repentment, and high-minded, she regretted this adventure more than you can imagine. But she repented it with indignation; and in stead of complaining to Martius of his inconstancy, she took a resolution to do all she could to drive him out of her heart. And the next day she answer'd only in these few words to a very obliging Letter he had writ to her.

Plotina

Plotina to Martius.

They who divert themselves very well in the places wherein they reside, need not seek pleasures elsewhere. Therefore for your own conveniency and mine, forbear to give your self the trouble of writing to me any more; but forget not, I conjure you, that I told you heretofore,

That when an heart in love's Realm goes
That heart is lost for ever and a day.

You may judge how extremly this Letter surpriz'd Martius, who was really very faithful. Not but that there was a fair person in the place where he resided, who gave pretext to the lie of Celina; for she was one of those gossiping women who have a thousand little inventions to force virtuous men to say more to them than they would, and than they think. Martius nevertheless writ several times again to Plotina, but she answer'd him no more. And therefore I often told her she was unjust to condemn Martius upon the bare report of a man who was a kind of Lover, and who besides was Brother to Lucia, who sought only to prejudice Martius. I believe perhaps more than you (answer'd Plotina) Martius is not so culpable, as I make semblance to believe: but to speak truth, being I should be loth to have a great passion in my soul, now my reason is a little stronger than it was, I seek my self to accuse Martius, and to improve my anger. I thought heretofore (continued she blushing) it was possible to be lov'd by a virtuous man without loving him more than was convenient; but I have now undeceiv'd my self, and I find that unless I take care, I should come perhaps to love Martius more than he lov'd me. Therefore to avoid so great an unhappiness, I conjure you never to tell me any thing that may serve to justify Martius. He is absent, I may suspect him of inconstancy, I am sensible of my honour, I love liberty and joy; so that there needs not much more to cure me. Plotina spoke this with a certain fierce and angry air, which made me believe she would have more difficulty to drive Martius out of her heart than she thought. However, I did as she desir'd, and spoke no more to her concerning Martius.

After this, many alterations hapned in Plotina's fortune (which I will not detain you with relating) both by reason of his absence whose Daughter she believ'd her self, and by the death of her whom she took to be her Mother. But at length, when I chang'd my condition, Plotina came to live with me, a little before Tarquin came to besiege Ardea. This adventure so amaz'd our City, that I cannot represent to you how great a terror there was at first amongst the people. But for that the inhabitants of Ardea are very courageous, they soon took heart again, and resolv'd to make a stout defence. As things were in this posture, Martius making use of this occasion, and knowing an attempt was to be made to bring a supply into the City, he put himself in the head of those that guarded it, and did such brave exploits, that it may be said 'twas he alone that procur'd the entrance of the Convoy into Ardea. As soon as he came thither, he went to the Governors of the City, and with much eloquence and boldness told them he was come to desire to die for his Country. This Action seem'd so noble, that in spite of Lycastes Relations, Martius had liberty to stay in Ardea, where there was great need of such persons as he. Whereupon he address'd again to Plotina, but found not such reception as formerly. At that time Horatius had brought Clelia to Ardea, and all the world was so charm'd with her beauty and virtue, that though she was very melancholy, she caus'd her self to be ador'd. Plotina and I were the two persons to whom she testifi'd most goodness, she made us privy to all her unhappiness, and we promis'd to serve her in every thing we could, though Horatius guarded her very carefully. Martius in the mean time was in despair, because he could not regain Plotina's heart, though he sufficiently manifest his innocency. For Celina himself, who was not over-valiant, fearing to be treated like Lycastes, and being at feud with his Sister, justifi'd him whom he had accus'd; for his love for Plotina was one of those young peoples affections who believe their honour lost unless they counterfeit themselves Lovers. Nevertheless though Plotina perceiv'd well enough that Martius was innocent, her heart was not affected towards him as it had been. But wherefore, Madam, (said he to her one day) do you not restore me that beginning of affection you had for me before? Because I will not, and cannot (answer'd she.) As for my esteem, I give it you entire again; but that kind of affection full of I know not what disquieting tenderness, I cannot recal into my heart if I would. Anger expell'd it thence, and my reason being become more strong, will hinder it from returning. Ah! unjust person that you are! (cry'd Martius) you cause me to undergo the most cruel adventure that ever was, and Lysimira's death was not more grievous to me. She dy'd loving me, she commanded me to love you, she took nothing from me; I cannot but commend her constancy, her memory is still dear to me: but as for you, I lose you without any fault of mine. I see you more amiable than ever, but I see you without hope of being lov'd. Yet if I had never had hope, I should be patient; but you have confess'd your self, you have had some kindness for me. I confess it again (answer'd Plotina) and if I had had less, perhaps I should have had it still; but to speak truth, after I found my heart so near engag'd that I should have been no longer Mistress of it, if I had continu'd but a little longer to love you, I am beholding to my anger which has cur'd me. But, Madam, that anger was ill grounded (reply'd he.) But, Martius, (excepted she) we are not bound to love all those that have not betray'd us. 'Tis true (answer'd he) but I conceive they that have begun to love any person, ought always to love him. If I had promis'd you so (reply'd Plotina) I would have kept my word; but I never acknowledg'd to you that I lov'd you till now I lov'd you no longer, and resolve not to do so. Ha! Madam (cry'd he) you carry your cruelty too far, and I believe never any adventure was like mine. In good earnest (said Plotina) nothing prejudices you in my heart but your merit, and the tenderness which I have had for you: and I confess to you ingenuously, you are the only man I have seen whom I have judg'd worthy of my affection. But I assure you at the same time, I was so much sham'd to understand my own weakness, when I believ'd you lov'd another, that I am not resolv'd to return ever into the like condition. But in acknowledgment of the affection you have had for me as far as I can, I assure you you also that I am resolv'd to defend my heart as long as I live, & therefore never to marry, for to marry and not love those we marry, is in my judgment the most foolish and mischievous thing in the world; and to assure ones self of the affection of any one, is the greatest rashness possible. Therefore Liberty is the safest course; and if you believe me, my example will be of use to you. Besides, 'tis very just that you be faithful to the Ashes of Lyfmiria. Alas! (answer'd Martius) 'tis easie for an indifferent person to advise indifference. But how comes it that having not hated me before, you hate me now? If I hated you (reply'd she) I could love you again; but, Martius, I esteem you, and I can have a certain solid friendship for you, which may engage my mind, but not much more my heart. Ah! Madam, I desire not that friendship (answer'd Martius) and I like hatred a thousand times better. 'Tis in vain that you would be hated (reply'd Plotina) for I esteem you too much. How? Madam, (said he hastily) is it an equal impossibility for me to obtain your hatred and your love? Yes, (answer'd Plotina) and as I love my self too much to love you, I esteem you too much to hate you. But to discover the bottom of my heart to you, know, I have the greatest Obligation to you in the world, for that you will be the cause that I shall without difficulty resist the affection of all those who perhaps may hereafter have a design to please me; for after the danger whereto you have expos'd my Liberty, I shall provide so timely for it, that it will be no more in hazard. What? Madam, (cry'd the afflicted Martius) will you deprive me of hope for ever? Ah! Madam, (added he) you do not know your self well, and perhaps your heart will do me justice even against your will. No, no, Martius, (answer'd she with a very serious air) you will never see me engag'd in an affection of that nature; I love joy, quiet and glory, and I will preserve them as long as I live. After this, say no more to me, for I shall not answer you. Martius would have disobey'd her, but she hindred him from speaking; and from thenceforward so carefully avoided to give him occasion to entertain her apart, that he could not find any. He knew well she spoke her mind, and when she shun'd him, she told him smilingly that she fear'd him; so that he was an hundred times more miserable. For it was true, that at that time Plotina more countenanced Damon, Sicinius and Acrisius, who were become amorous of her, though she neither lov'd nor esteem'd them, than she did Martius, for whom she had a very great esteem. And this was matter of no small joy to Lucia. But wherefore do you not shun Acrisius? (said I to her one day.) Because he is too great a talker (answer'd she) and so I cannot fear that he will ever please me. Why then do not you decline Sicinius? (reply'd I.) Because he speaks so little (added she) that I cannot apprehend he is likely to persuade me; and as for Damon, I have as little reason to fear that he will cause me to change my sentiments towards him. But how comes it (said I) that you heretofore so much resisted those that endeavour'd to divert you from following the inclination you had for Martius, and now you have more reason to love him, you love him no longer? Because at that time (answer'd she) my inclination was strong, and my reason weak; but anger having cur'd me of my pre-conceiv'd opinion, I have taken a wife resolution to spend all my life in liberty. I will indeed entertain a certain free friendship (added she) which shall not perplex, but divert me no less than love:

but as for great affections, I will not admit of any at all, for they cannot be entertain'd without disquiet. The way you intend to take (said I to her) is perhaps as dangerous as that you would avoid: for many of those friendships of gallantry approach very easily to wantonness, if heed be not taken to them. You shall see (said she) I know how to avoid so dangerous an extream, and understand better than you think, the bounds of all the several sorts of friendship that can be had. But wherefore have you not one of these kinds (said I) for the poor Martius, for whom I now intercede? Ah! Cesonia, (answer'd she smiling) do you not know there is a Proverb which says,

*That in the Seas of love, on the same self,
No dextrous Saylor twice ere splits himself?*

You speak so little seriously (reply'd I) that I care not to speak any more to you. In good earnest (answer'd she) I declare clearly what I think, and profess that I will have no kind of affection as long as I live, which may disturb my quiet. When I began to have an inclination for Martius, I was so young that I wanted strength to oppose it, but at present I am assur'd I shall defend my heart better. For, in fine, I am so resolv'd to love my self, and consequently to love quiet, liberty and glory, (as I said at another time) that I will never love any of those people who cannot be lov'd without hazarding those three things which undoubtedly are the most agreeable in the world. But could not you marry Martius? (said I.) If I would marry any one (answer'd she) I confess Martius might oblige me thereto; but, Cesonia, I have so great an aversion from marriage, that I cannot consider him as one that is to be my husband: and I am so resolv'd never to marry, that I believe nothing can make me change my sentiments. For I judge nothing better, than to resolve to live free; and when I consider all the consequences, which almost infallibly attend a wedded life, they make me to tremble. Not but that I conceive there may be some marriage happy; but, Cesonia, where shall we find two persons, who have wit, constancy, goodness enough one for another, and a sufficient resemblance of natures to live always well together? Some there may be, but they are few; and I do not think my self fortunate enough to meet with so great a felicity. 'Tis therefore more easie for me to take a resolution to live in liberty. As she was speaking this, by a strange chance, all her Lovers came one after another to see me, and were together in my Chamber. So that Plotina being in her jolly humor, told me smilingly, that she had a desire to undeceive all persons, and make a publick Declaration of her sentiments. And thereupon in a very delightful way of raillery, she told them all she had absolutely resolv'd not to love any person much, and never to marry at all; and that the most which could be hop'd from her, was to please her, to obtain her esteem, and to have some part in a kind of calm friendship which she was resolv'd to have as long as she liv'd. For in truth (said she) I will never run the venture of meeting with indiscreet, unfaithful, capricious, lukewarm, unequal and deceitful Lovers, nor bring my self in danger of having a jealous, covetous, prodigal, humorsome, imperious, furly, foolish, or little virtuous Husband, nor consequently of having deformed, vicious, ingrateful and wicked Children; and I incomparably prefer to spend my whole life with the liberty of having such Friends of either Sex as I please. For I find that if I should marry, I should

should be so good a Wife that I should thereby be miserable. All Plotina's Lovers oppos'd her sentiments, and especially Martius; but she answer'd them so well, that they knew not what more to say to her. And so she continu'd firm in her resolution.

But now, there being no great pleasure in living in a besieged City, three or four of Plotina's friends and mine resolv'd together with us to make use of Clelia's occasion to go out of Ardea; for Horatius would not stay there, out of a belief that Tarquin would take the City. So that Plotina, without considering what grief she should cause Martius, employ'd him to manage this affair, and to bring it to pass that, we might be guarded by the same convoy which attended on Clelia. The conversation of Plotina and Martius was very extraordinary, and I know not how Plotina was able to be so inflexible as she was. For he us'd all imaginable blandishments and endearing expressions to move her heart, but she continu'd inalterable in her sentiments; and all he could draw from her, was, that he should never see her love any person more than himself, and that she would never marry as long as she liv'd. And indeed if the poor Martius had liv'd, I declare to you, that you would have had less interest in Plotina's heart; but you must know that when we went out of Ardea with Clelia, this generous Lover, notwithstanding his regret, came himself to conduct us; and departed himself with so heroical and passionate an air, that Plotina esteem'd him much the more for it. Now being it was fear'd that we should be sooner discover'd by the enemies if we had any considerable number of people with us, Horatius, Martius and eight of their Friends took upon themselves alone the charge of conducting us. But, such was our ill fortune, we met with Hellius, one of the Ministers of Tarquin's cruelty, who came in the head of a Party of twenty to set upon Horatius, Martius and their Friends.

How? (interrupted Amilcar) was Martius amongst those whom Hellius fought with, when Aronces, Herminius and Celer (from whom Artemidorus, Zenocrates and I parted that morning) arriv'd and carri'd away Clelia who was at the foot of a Tree with you? Yes (answer'd Cesonia) and the unfortunate Martius was slain by Hellius in the beginning of the Fight, though he was very valiant. And indeed 'twas his courage occasion'd his death; for he charg'd with too great violence into the midst of those who came to take Plotina and her Friends. I will not tell you the particular passages of this encounter, for you have understood from the mouth of Aronces how Horatius and Hellius perceiving others were carrying away Clelia, joyn'd together to recover her; and how Aronces, Herminius and Celer resisted so many enemies at the same time. Yes, generous Cesonia (answer'd Amilcar) I know all that pass'd in that great occasion. I know what Clelia did, putting her self courageously before those that would assault her three protectors, I know how terrible a Combate it was, in what manner Aronces fought with Horatius, and how the generous Herminius defended both his life and liberty, and spoke to Hellius, and with what generosity Aronces assisted the wounded Horatius, whom he found by night in a Wood: but I know in what manner Plotina lamented Martius when you were taken, and carried to Tarquin. Do not enquire so much of her grief (reply'd Cesonia) for perhaps you will think it too violent; for in good earnest, no greater affliction can be resent-

But at length (constitution prevailing) she comforted her self with the thought, that perhaps if Martius had liv'd, she might have had the weakness as not to be able to defend her heart; and since that (you know) your converse has reviv'd joy in her soul.

Cesonia having done speaking, Amilcar thank'd her, for having related to him that which he had so long desir'd to know. Not but that I am almost troubled (added he) that Plotina could never begin again to love Martius; for if ever I should unwittingly incur her displeasure, and she should deprive me of her friendship, I see she would never restore it to me again any more than she did to Martius. In my opinion (answer'd Cesonia) you are so little accusom'd to be ill-treated, that you do not fear so much as you pretend, that you could not make your peace with Plotina if you should happen to be out of her favour. On the contrary (reply'd Amilcar) I have scarce ever been very happy, and I am not so now; Plotina has certainly only a tenderness of friendship for me. But is it possible (said Cesonia) that Amilcar has been almost perpetually ill-treated? Since I am not capable of false boasting, (answer'd he) I confess sincerely, I have seldom been much lov'd. I have many times had the advantage to be acceptable even to those women who have ill-treated me: but my merry and jovial humor has done me more injury in serious gallantry than I can express to you. However, since it has caus'd me as much delight as the favours of my Mistresses could have done, I do not complain of my destiny. Yet I would know (said Cesonia) whether any very intelligent person has ill-treated you? I lov'd one in Greece (answer'd he) who is one of the most amiable Women in the World. She is brown then (reply'd Cesonia) being she is a Greek. That consequence is not always infallible (answer'd Amilcar) but it is true the amiable Nerinha I speak of has hair of the goodliest black that ever was seen; a black shining and bright, which becomes her admirably well. She is of a very handsome tallness, and well proportion'd; her Eyes are black, sparkling, full of fire and spirit; and though she has no wantonness in her looks, but on the contrary has a very modest air, yet when she smiles, she has an amiable aspect which pleases infinitely. Nerinha's visage is oval and of good symmetry, her mould handsome, her cheeks agreeable, her nose well shap'd, and she has an air of beauty which renders her very graceful and lovely; and though her complexion is of no extraordinary whiteness, yet her beauty is lively and capable to excite love. But besides all this, Nerinha is infinitely ingenious, and of so clear a perception as keeps her from speaking things at random. She is gentle, civil, good and obliging, she is serious and debonaire together without inequality; and though she is perfectly virtuous and even severe, yet she converses gallantly with her Friends, and sufficiently loves all reasonable diversions. She is a good friend and very generous, very regular in all her actions, and very careful to satisfy all the duties of civility and friendship. She never jests dangerously, she blames no person; and having a mind naturally sociable, she never speaks that of another which she would not have spoken of her self. Nerinha has a very sweet and pleasing voice, she sings very agreeably, though she does not much care for it. She speaks exactly, writes handsomely, and in brief is so charming, that though she would not accept my heart, yet she shall have my esteem and friendship as long as she lives. Perhaps (said Cesonia) she had had neither the one

nor the other, if she had accepted your affection. I am not of your opinion (answer'd Amilcar) but I confess to the glory of Nerinha, I am always her Friend though she would not have me for her Lover. There are so few people amiable (said Cesonia) that methinks such as are so, ought to be always lov'd. It has been a complaint in all past ages (answer'd he) and will be in all to come, that there are not virtuous people enough: And yet I believe the number is almost equal in all times. I am not of your opinion (reply'd Cesonia) for I think there never were fewer than at present, of such as make reckoning of persons of merit. No, believe me (said Amilcar) the World is not yet so poor of virtuous people as they report, and there is also more liberality and gallant generosity than is imagin'd. For during the time I was at Syracusa, there hapned many things to a young Lady of that plate, which prove that which I say. Know then that this person is of noble birth, but her fortune is sufficiently bad; her heart is generous, she makes profession of being good, and without ostentation of wit has gain'd a greater reputation than she sought; know, I say, this person has had divers adventures which prove that virtue is yet in request. For (not to reckon up the number of Friends she has) many presents were made to her after a particular manner; and because it was known that she delighted more to give than to receive, an unusual contrivance was practis'd. For one morning while she was yet asleep, a crafty man deceiv'd the slave that open'd the gate to him without telling who sent him, and left a compleat furniture for a Chamber (the most agreeable and gallant that could be seen) in her Court; and though great search was made to find out the author of this liberality, yet he could not be discover'd. Yet the person who receiv'd it imagin'd she knew by whom she was thus oblig'd, but one of her friends so perswaded her that it was forbidden her to conjecture, that she was forc'd to suppress her gratitude and confine it within her heart, without daring to publish the glory of her Benefactor. To this same Lady a great Princess of a very remote Country (who is both illustrious, of a great beauty, wit, and heart) has writt'n divers times very eloquently in a language which is not natural to her, and sent her a Bracelet of her Hair which is the goodliest in the World, with a clasp of Diamonds the richest that ere was seen. The chief Vestal has also made her several agreeable presents after a very ingenious and obliging manner; so have the generous Amalthea, the Princess Elismonda, a noble stranger, and divers of her Friends of either Sex. 'Tis true, all these liberalities do not make her Fortüne; but her humor is such that she likes them better than if they were of another nature. I have known as much as this (answer'd Cesonia) but four or five persons make no great number in a great Country. After this, Amilcar and Cesonia talkt very sadly of the pitiful condition in which the twenty fair Roman Ladies were, who were to be sent back to Porfenna. Yet there was nothing to be fear'd from that King but only in respect of Clelia, who he believ'd escap'd from his Camp only because she knew something of the pretended conspiracy of Aronces and Mutius. But the next morning it hapned that Publicola was inform'd that a certain man had met Mutius very melancholy upon the way to Praneste, and therefore he believ'd that this despairing Lover, knowing that the great Festival of Fortune was to be celebrated within two days, was gone to that famous Temple, to see whether the Lots were more favourable to him; for 'tis reported that on that day the Decisions were more infallible than on any other of all the year. Wherefore he determin'd to request Amilcar to go thither, who accordingly accepted of this Commission. Yet he did not depart till after he had seen Clelia and all her companions gone, to be reconducted to the Camp; but to the end the people might not tumult at so sad a spectacle, they were caus'd to pass through the most unfrequented streets that was possible. No doubt they were very sad in the bottom of their hearts, especially Clelia; but their sadness was discreet, and Clelia amongst the rest testifi'd an admirable constancy. All their Lovers follow'd them as far as they could; but at length it behov'd them to take leave. Horatius would have gone to present them to Porfenna, thinking to speak something which might conduce to their safety; but Publicola thought not convenient, and made choice of a Kinsman of Clelia, who was more advanc'd in years, and was both prudent and resolute. So these fair Virgins took the way towards the Camp, and Amilcar that towards Praneste. As he was going thither he met with Theonor and Emilius the Lovers of Terentia and Aureliia, who had at length resolv'd to refer their fortunes to the Lots of the Temple of Fortune. Amilcar being a person known to all Porfenna's Court, they were very joyful to light upon him, and he (being no lover of solitariness) was as well satisfi'd to meet with such agreeable company. Their first discourse was a melancholy reflection upon the misfortunes of Aronces and Clelia; but as the most generous easily enough turn away their minds from the unhappineses of others, they came by degrees to talk of matters indifferent. Theonor set himself to extol Hetruria above all other Countries, Emilius to commend Greece where he had liv'd a long time, and Amilcar to praise and disparage all the Countries he had seen. For as there is no beauty so perfect (said he) in which something is not to be desir'd, so there is no Country but has its defects. In a place where the Climate is temperate, the people are light and inconstant; in another, the people have much wit, and are accus'd of little fidelity: in one Country many times we find Sciences and Vices, in another innocent and rusticity. In one place nothing is to be seen but Cottages, in another nothing but Palaces. So that as a hundred Beauties are requisite to make up a perfect one, so you must select the excellencies of a hundred Countries to form one accomplish'd. You must take the mildness of the Climate of one, the Rivers and Seas of another, the Flowers and Fruits of another, yea the very Birds and Butter-flies; you must fetch the Sciences and Arts from one place, Valour from another, Honesty from amongst people of less nimble Wits, and exact justice from Heaven (for in truth there is not much to be found upon earth.)

Amilcar, no doubt, has reason (said Theonor) but however I dare affirm Hetruria has almost every thing that can be found elsewhere. The Climate is gentle, mens manners good, ignorance begins to be banish'd from it, and excellent Arts to be carefully promoted. As for excellent Arts (answer'd Amilcar) I much doubt whether you can prove that they flourish as much in Hetruria as in Greece; for I confess with sincerity to the shame of my Country, that Africa possesses them but imperfectly, and the proud Carthage yields in this to the least Cities of Greece. Then you have not seen that stately Tomb which Porfenna is building building (said Theanor?) I have heard of it (answer'd Amilcar) but whatever has been told me of it, I have not fanci'd it to be an extraordinary piece. Yet it is such (repli'd Theanor) that I question whether the Labyrinth of Crete and the Pyramids of Egypt excel it; for, in fine, it is a Master-piece of Architecture. All the stateliness which the imagination can conceive, is seen in it. This proud Tomb is above three hundred foot on each side; the form of it is square, the stones are of a prodigious greatness, and admirably well polished. In the base of this Monument is a Labyrinth greater and more intricate than that of Crete, for it is impossible to expedite your self out of it, unless he that built it give you one of his servants to guide you; and there are so many turnings and windings, and so many places which go one into another, of which all the ornaments are uniform, that 'tis impossible to find the right way. Upon this spacious base of above twelve hundred feet square, stand five great Pyramids one at each corner and the fifth in the midst. They are triangular, and are sixty feet broad at the base, and a hundred and fifty high. Upon the point of every of these Pyramids is plac'd a Copper-Globe of prodigious greatness, contriv'd so artificially, that the wind entering into it at several holes which are seen in it, makes a sufficiently agreeable harmony, which is heard at a good distance. Upon the top of each Globe is a kind of Obelisk, and upon it is seen another harmonious Globe like the former, according as the wind moves that which makes the harmony; and upon this Globe appear four other Pyramids of a hundred feet in height. But do not think I am at the end of my description; for these four Pyramids support a great terrass, upon which stand five other Pyramids as high as all the rest of the Tomb, so that the points of them seeming to touch the Skie, make a very magnificent spectacle. 'Tis true (said Emilius) this Tomb is the stateliest thing in the World, and 'tis true also that the gallant house of the illustrious Cleonymus will be the goodliest place of the earth when it shall be finish'd. As for Cleonymus (answer'd Amilcar) I know he is a man of extraordinary merit, whose birth is very noble, whose employments are the most considerable in Hetruria, whose heart is perfectly great, virtue sublime, and capacity infinite. But I confess I have not given too much credit to all that Lucilius and Theomenas told me once concerning the fair house you speak of. Nevertheless 'tis true (reply'd Theanor) that there is nothing handsomer in the world. As they were discoursing thus, they arriv'd at a place where they were to refresh their horses, so that they were constrain'd to stay there. This place was so wild, the prospect of it so bounded and little agreeable, and the reception so incommodious, that having taken but a slight repast, they went to seat themselves on certain stones which were at the foot of a steep mountain near that place. They were no sooner there, but Amilcar beginning to speak, I beseech you, Theanor, (said he) fill my imagination with handsome ideas, by the description of the goodly house of Cleonymus: for my eyes are so little delighted with what they behold, that I have great need of your help: besides, I love nothing more than the representation of handsome objects, and I assure you I shall be much oblig'd to you for it. For the generous Melintha being friend to Cleonymus, I interest myself already in every thing which relates to him, I shall tell you then that Valterra (said Theanor) — But Volterra (interrupted Amilcar) is, as I conceive, a great city sufficiently remote from Clusium. You say true (answer'd Theanor) but I said Valterra, and not Volterra: 'Tis true, these two names are near alike, and Valterra bears a name resembling that of that famous City you speak of, (which was founded by the Tyrrhenians, as well as Areffa and Clusium) because this City has so many waters about it, that there is no gate or place in which there are not fountains; so that the conformity of the waters has occasion'd the resemblance of the names. But to proceed: when you require the description of Valterra, you demand a thing of greater difficulty than you imagine; because this place has so many surprising beauties, that they cannot be conceiv'd without being seen, nor represented well after having admir'd them. It was begun and finish'd by a man who does nothing but what is great, and the vast extent of whose mind is not capable of framing small designs: by a man, I say, who devoting his whole life to the service of his King, will have even his pleasures serve to the embellishment and glory of his country. But though he employ in the building of Valterra only such hours as are necessary to recreate his mind from great cares, to which the welfare of the State engages him; yet at the same time he is making a thing which one would believe could not but take up his whole life. For it is not to be imagin'd that Valterra is one of those places which are embellish'd almost by Nature alone; but 'tis no hyperbole to say Cleonymus has absolutely chang'd it, and there is no part of it to which he has not added some new grace. He has divided a River into a thousand fountains, he has re-united a thousand fountains into torrents, and he has so judiciously contriv'd every thing which he has done at Valterra, that the judgment of him cannot be sufficiently extoll'd, who knew so well how to intermingle the beauties of Art with those of Nature, and so industriously to diversify all the ornaments of so goodly a place. 'Tis true, this handsome Defart being design'd for the habitation of one of the fairest persons in the world, ought to be such as it is, to be worthy of her; for you must know, the prudent Artemira wife of the illustrious Cleonymus has one of those grand Beauties which continually encrease admiration: and that which I esteem most, is, her virtue redoubles the price of her beauty; for, as wanton a person as you are, I am confident you will grant that these two things suit admirably well together. I confess it (answer'd Amilcar) therefore tell me a little more particularly what you know of the fair Artemira. Ha! Amilcar (reply'd Theanor) I tremble only in thinking that I have undertaken to describe Gardens and Fountains to you; judge then what I should do if I should undertake to tell you all the Grand qualities, and all the virtues of one of the most accomplish'd persons in the World. Be contented therefore if I perform my promise to describe Valterra. But before I tell you, what it is at present, I must relate a little adventure to you, which is necessary that you know, to understand the description I am to make.

Know then, that a fair and young person, Kinswoman to the King of Hetruria and much lov'd by him, sometimes hapned to excite love in a man of Quality, of a violent and imperious humor; who judging that he could never be favour'd, resolv'd to carry his Mistress away by force. Which accordingly he did one day as she was walking in a Grove; and diverting her self by causing a Squirrel to follow her from tree tree to tree, which she had kept from a little one, and which lov'd her with more ardour than a Dog can have for his Master, though the Dog is an Emblem of Fidelity amongst all Nations. This violent act much surpris'd the whole Court, and especially an honourable person of Clusium, whose name was Cleoranthus, and from whom the illustrious Cleonymus who built Valterra is descended; for you must know, he was very amorous of her, though he durst not declare it by reason of the King. But in this unexpected occasion, he could not hide his sentiments. Wherefore suddenly gathering together some of his Dependants, he went to seek this stolt Lady. The King also sent out most of his Court to the same purpose, and went himself; but this search was made unprofitable, and Cleoranthus had been as unhappy as the rest, if the Chance which guided him to a Cottage of Shepherds had not shew'd him the little Squirrel which his Mistress lov'd so much, and which stuck to her in spite of her Ravishers. At first he believ'd it was another; but the little Animal knowing him, skipt down from the window where it was with that nimbleness which is natural to it. Whereby Cleoranthus, believing his Mistress might be there, or at least had pass'd by that way, askt a young Shepherdess where she was to whom this pretty Animal belong'd. He had no sooner made this question, but he who had carry'd away that fair Virgin (coming from enquiring the way he was to take, because he had fail'd to meet his guide) appear'd with his Sword in his hand, follow'd by six of his Attendants; and at the same time four men, who had stay'd to guard that fair person, issu'd out of the Cottage with their Swords drawn too. But Cleoranthus, instead of being terrifi'd by so many enemies, became thereby more fierce and courageous. And so he attack'd his Rival with such valour, that notwithstanding the inequality of number, he slew his enemy, and three others, and put the rest to flight. After which, to compleat his happiness, he understood by one of those he wounded who lay upon the place, the secret of a great Conspiracy against the Prince. Thus Cleoranthus deliver'd his Mistress, and saved all Hetruria by his valour. But which was remarkable, at the end of the fight, the Squirrel made him a thousand caresses, and would not part from him. Wherefore when the King was inform'd of all the Circumstances of the business, and of Cleoranthus passion for this fair person (whom notwithstanding he restor'd into his power without signifying any thing of his love) was so mov'd with his Virtue, that he suppress'd the inclination himself had for her, and caus'd her to marry him. But to eternize the memory of this generous action, as Hector, Aeneas, and many others since, caus'd Lyons, Roses, Doves, and divers other things agreeing either to their valour, merit, virtue or fortune, to be painted upon their shields, he order'd that Cleoranthus and his Descendants should bear a Squirrel for their Arms. And accordingly they of this Family bear a Squirrel in their shields to this day. I desire your pardon for having amus'd you with speaking of this adventure; but you will see in the sequel of my discourse, that I have not related it altogether impertinently. I am next to tell you that Valterra is situated half a days journey from Clusium, that the way between them is very pleasant, and that to encrease the surprize, the beauty of it is not perceiv'd till you arrive at the fore Court, which is stately, fair and spacious. It hath four great Pavilions at the four Corners, with other Courts on the two sides. The two faces which stand upon the stately Moats of Valterra, end in three great Archades of Architecture, through which are discover'd two large low Wings of Building, which have been built for Offices to the House, and two Gardens which lie on the side of those two Wings. When you are in the fore Court, you behold the front of the Palace, which is built upon a Mountain of Architecture (if I may so speak) for the Perroon which takes up the whole breadth of the second Court, has four seats, and rises above twenty steps. So that this gives much Majesty to the Structure. Which before I describe to you, I must lead you back again into the fore Court, and tell you, that after you have pass'd through it, you come to the Bank of the Moats which are large, handsome; and the water of them clear as Crystal, and arises from a Spring. These Moats are beset with Rails on both sides; and near the Bridge which lies over them, are seen the Muzzles of Lyons casting out water into three Scalop Basins, which shed it one into another till it fall into the Moats. When you have pass'd the Bridge, and come into the midst of a little half Moon adorn'd with Rails, you may see that the second Court, which is very large and handsom, has a terrass on two sides rais'd three steps, upon which are plac'd two spirting Fountains, which make a very handsom shew in that place. For when you are at the end of the Bridge, there is nothing more stately and magnificent than to see those handsome Moats full of water, the second Court the Balustrades, the spirting Fountains, and that great and magnificent Perroon which crosses the whole Court, rising so Majestically, and upon which is seen in the middle of the Palace a great Porch of three stately Arches supported by six Pillars, which suffer the sight to penetrate through the whole thickness of the Palace by three other Arches opposite to the three first, and three other likewise opposite to the second; so that the Skie appearing at several overtures, this sight is the more agreeable. In the midst of the Porch are seen two very handsome Statues of young Children taming Lyons, to imitate that innocence achieves every thing; and the Arms of Cleonymus, such as I have represented them to you by relating the glorious adventure of one of his Ancestors. The Cupolo which arises in the midst of the Building is very magnificent, and so are the Busts, and the carv'd works wherewith this Palace is adorn'd in divers places. But when you have ascended the Perroon, and are arriv'd at the Porch, you find it handsomer than you imagin'd; for the proportion of it is exact and noble, it is supported by twelve pillars of a very handsome order of Architecture. From thence you behold with pleasure the two fair Courts you pass'd through: but, which is a greater grace, you enter upon an even pavement into the goodliest Hall that ever was. For its greatness astonishes the imagination, its height surprises, and its beauty is so great, that it takes away the boldness to commend it. The Cupolo is supported by sixteen stately Arches, whereof six are open; namely, three towards the Porch, and three toward the Gardens, which are admirable. But how rare soever they are, I must stay you a little in the Hall, and at least shew you the first apartment of this proud Fabrick. I must also tell you that for the glory of this great design, Cleonymus has been so happy as to find an excellent man capable to execute his great intentions, and happily to invent whatever might serve to the embellishment of so goodly a place. He I speak of, is call'd Meleander, and is the same that painted the Cabinet of the generous Melintha. He was born with a great wit, an exquisite fancy, and an admirable judgment. His Ideas are noble and natural, there is grandeur in his designs, and reason always in what he makes. Therefore he was chosen by Cleonymus to paint this proud Hall, and all the several apartments of his Palace; and also to use his inventions and counsels for all such things as might imbellish Valterra. But since his aim is always to work for the glory of him that employs him, see what the design of the Hall is, of which I will unfold to you the hidden sense after I have given you the description. The Sun is represented there in his Palace with all the Ornaments Poets attribute him; the whole Base of the Picture is encompass'd with a great Serpent representing the year; upon this Serpent move the months, the weeks and the days; every season is accompani'd with the months, weeks and days which agree to it; and all the Stars are seen there, which the Sun visits in making his course. But in the midst of this proud Palace of the Sun (the Architecture of which is admirable, and the Pillars resemble precious stones, and the Basis and Chapters gold) is seen upon a proud arch a Throne of Gold rais'd several steps, upon which the Hours, daughters of the Sun mount and descend. They are represented like young fair persons, habited in different and light dresses. This luminous God is clothed with a cloak of cloath of Gold, he is crown'd with an immortal Laurel, he leans with one hand upon his harp, and with the other he makes a sign to Aurora as if he commanded something; for his eyes are turn'd towards her. This fair harbinger of the Sun has a garland of Flowers and Pearls upon her head; she has wings painted with fine colours; with one hand she scatters flowers in divers places, and with the other she holds a torch, which she makes use of to illuminate a New Star by the command of the Sun. This new Star is plac'd in the midst of the Heaven in form of a Squirrel, three higher stars give it their most favorable influences. Saturn bearing his fickle encompasseth it with his Serpent beset with Stars, which denotes the eternity of its glory. Jupiter sitting upon his Eagle with a very noble action and Majestical air gives it a Crown of gold, to signify the Authority which it is to have. Mars on the other side with his fierce aspect gives it a Helmet and a Lyon. Below the Sun appears the Season which represents Summer, crown'd with ears of Corn, her Complexion is a little Sun-burnt, her hair is gilded, her air is very agreeable; she carelessly sits and leans upon such fruits as are suitable to her, and near her are seen several instruments necessary to Agriculture. She holds a sheaf of Wheat in her hand, and is supported by a swarthy man who represents the South Wind. About her stand the Moneths which belong to her, represented by young persons crown'd with flowers and fruits; they have Wings, their Attires are different, and they present fruits to this lovely Season, as well as the weeks and days which are represented by little children who seem to move along as they play near her. In another place Mercury appearing with all the marks that particularize him, lifting up his arm wherewith he holds his Caduce, seems as if he would give all his eloquence and knowledge to the New Star I mention'd, he looks upon it so favourably. About this God are seen several instruments necessary for excellent Arts, and likewise divers little Cupids denoting the various inclination which Nature gives. The Moon, not being able to behold her Brother, appears through the shadow of a Cloud, and about her is seen a great hunting equipage, as dogs, bugles, bows, arrows, and divers other things, and in many places little Genii agreeably represented; this fair Star regards the new Star as favorably as Mercury. On another side Venus follow'd by Sports and Laughter appears lying upon a bed of Roses; and near her are seen divers things which agree to her, and which are always inseparable from pleasures. She holds a golden Apple in her hand, seeming to offer it to this new Star, as if she meant, that it was such amongst the Stars as her self amongst the Goddesses. Also several little Cupids are seen playing near her. The Spring is represented by a Young fair Girl, with a fresh and smiling air, her hair is brown and curl'd, she has a crown of flowers upon her head, her attire is green; the Months which are near her, present flowers to her, Zephyrus flatters her, and the weeks and days busie themselves in embellishing her. Autumn is figur'd by a good lusty man, crown'd with Vine-leaves, he lies amongst fruits which are proper to him, and leans upon a Tyger, the Moneths which accompany him offer him their fruits also, they are attended likewise with their weeks and days, and the Wind of this Season is represented there also, but more fierce than the rest, and the drapery of the figure shews that he inconveniences him by his impetuous blast. On the side opposite to Summer is represented the Bow of Iris with all the Colours that render it so agreeable. Under this Bow appears Winter represented by a rough old man, crown'd with mists, snow, and icycles. The Moneths, weeks and days which accompany him offer him nothing but unpleasing presents, except some of those days which are very little, and offer him fire. On the side of the Bow I mentioned, are Castor and Pollux, who mount and descend upon the Horizon: but I must not forget to tell you that in all places where that famous Squirrel is represented, either in a Star, or in its natural form, there is a device added to it which is very graceful in the language in which it was made; and the sense of it is, That there is nothing so high where-to it cannot mount. But now to expound to you the hidden meaning of all these Pictures, I am to tell you that the Sun represents Cleonymus, who according to the amplitude of his great employments, operates and shines every where, does good to all, and labours continually for the benefit and embellishing of the Universe. By the four Seasons of the year, Meleander has pretended to represent the several States of Hetruria which are tributary, and attribute the honour to Cleonymus of receiving and rendring all, because he has the management of the Princes treasures. The new Star in the top of the Skie, shews that there is nothing more sublime than the glory of Cleonymus; and that Starry Serpent I spoke of, denotes the prudence of this Heroe: so that the Pictures of this proud Hall, satisfy together both the Eyes and the Reason, and serve at the same time both to the glory of this Heroe, and that of the excellent Meleander, who has so well found out the art to commend him by his Pencils more than Poetry could do. But to pass from the Hall to the anti-Chamber, upon the top of the ceiling you see Hercules carried into the heavens in a Chariot of gold, under which is a slain Serpent. Reason (represented by a fair young person of a sage aspect) guides him; she has a helmet on her head, and holds a sword wherewith she seems to menace: two fierce and heady horses withdraw the chariot that carries him, and by their impetuous posture intimate that they represent the Passions, Passions, who in spite of their violence are nevertheless subjected to Reason. They have both a dusky brightness in their eyes. But there is one especially, whose mane stands erected, and who lifts up his head fiercely, whose piercing, lively and furious eyes cast a fiery glance which astonishes and surprises such as have skill in Painture. Fame is painted flying there, and seeming as if she would descend to the earth; and in a very bright part of the heaven appears Jupiter and the other Gods preparing to receive this Heroe, who is follow'd by Glory, putting an Oaken Garland upon his head. But what is rare in this Piece, is, that in whatever part of the chamber you stand, this Hercules seems to behold you as naturally in one place as in another. But I do not consider that I trouble you by not being able to represent these admirable Pieces but imperfectly. Yet I would further tell you something of the principal chamber: but to speak truth, I have seen so handsome and admirable a description of it, that I cannot but tremble to attempt it. For indeed I never saw any thing so handsome as that which a certain Virtuoso has writ upon this Subject; describing things so to the life, that you would think you beheld them with your eyes; and though he employs almost all the terms of Art, yet his discourse is clear, florid, eloquent and natural.

Oh! I beseech you, (said Amilcar) tell me all that you have seen in that magnificent Palace; for I never saw the handsome description you commend so much; and if I return into Africa shortly, (as I expect) I shall not see it in a long time. If you were to see it, (answer'd Theano) I would resolve not to content your curiosity; for besides that the description I shall make of it will be much less exact and ample than that, being I have the same things to describe, and Painture has certain peculiar terms which cannot be omitted, you would accuse me of a crime which I have no design to commit, and presently imagine that I intended only to copy it out, and deprive him of the commendations he has so justly merited. But however, since you desire it (continu'd he) I shall tell you, that the famous Meleander aiming always at the glory of his Heroe, has in the roof of this chamber represented Fidelity carry'd up by her powerful Genius into heaven. This Figure is very handsome, habited in white with a blew Robe, and has several marks which make her known: Prudence conducts her, Virtue and Reason are of each side of her admirably represented; the latter seems to personate Apollo shooting with his Bowe against Envy and divers other monsters which hide themselves in the thickness of the clouds. Under these Figures is Clio, one of the most famous Muses; she seems to bear her self up in the air with great wings display'd; scarce any thing is seen of her but her back; her Robe is of the colour of Gold, and beneath it another flying clothing of a different colour. This Muse helps to carry up Fidelity into heaven, and holds a Trumpet to publish that there is nothing whereto the fidelity of Cleonymus cannot attain. This Piece being in the midst of the chamber, is the principal design of the Painter; all the rest which encompasses it, suit with it, and depend of it. The most ingenious contrivance is, that this excellent Painter has by his Art made the whole roof of the chamber appear a great and stately body of building, with the goodliest ornaments that Painture and Sculpture have invented. For having drawn five large overtures, one in the midst, and the others on the four sides, five admirable Pieces are represented in them, which perfectly embellish the room. But besides these Pieces, the Figures plac'd upon this seeming structure are the handsomest in the world. For the eight famous sisters of Clio are painted on the four sides of the chamber, and seem to make a concert of praises in honour of him whom Fidelity represents. But they are so exquisite, that nothing can be seen in the world more admirable. All their heads have different airs, their actions correspond with what they represent, and they have a certain aspect of divinity which excites respect. These Figures are plac'd near four base-reliefs of the colour of brass, beset with several magnificent ornaments. For in this place are seen four different Poems represented by different figures. The Satyrical is represented by a Satyre lying along; he leans upon a great Urn, and has a young child before him, who shews him three words written upon a Table which declare what he is. Below this base-relief are seen divers excellent ornaments, wherein the Squirrel and the Device are conveniently plac'd: for there is an antique Urn of lapis Lazuli; upon that an Eagle, upon the Eagle a Squirrel, and on both sides of the Urn very jolly Cupids and Garlands, which falling down upon the Eagles back, slide from thence very gracefully. The other base-reliefs are like, excepting the Poems. That which treats only of Rustical things, is represented by the God Pan; the Heroick, by a stately and handsome man holding a Trumpet in his hand; the Lyrick, by a fair Virgin holding a Harp. Each of these Figures has a little Cupid like the first, and each Poem has two Muses which accompany it: Melpomene and Thalia are near the Satyrick. The former (to whom the invention of Tragedy is attributed) has fierceness and melancholy in her eyes: her attire is suitable to her quality, and her gesture and air speak her mind employ'd about great thoughts and events: and to denote her chief subject, Trumpets, Helmets, Shields and Crowns (mingled together with a confusion more agreeable than order) are seen near her. As for the Muse design'd for Comedy, she has a pretty, scornful, cheerful and smiling air. Her head is crown'd with Ivie, and her neck bare; she has rich bracelets, and a large blew robe, which is very graceful to her. She holds a Vizard in her hand, and has another at her feet which resembles a Satyre, and near her lie like Trophies all the instruments proper for Bacchanals. Near the Poem destined to country-matters, stand Terpsichore and Euterpe; one holding a kind of harp, the other a flute, on which she seems to play. The former has a noble air, the other somewhat rustick and wild: their habits are agreeable, and the variety of colours does not interrupt that union which is requisite to all good Pictures. Near these Muses are seen books, maps, hoboyes and bagpipes. The Heroick Poem has Calliope and Urania by it: the former having a book in her hand, and the latter leaning upon one of those Globes which a Disciple of the wise Thales invented, holds a pair of Compasses in the other hand. Calliope has a sage and majestic air; and Urania fixing her eyes upon the heavens, seems to observe the course of the Stars, and mind nothing else. Polyhymnia and Erato are plac'd near the Lyrick Poem; the first chiefly destined to Painture, has near her all the instruments requisite to that excellent Art: her habit is mix'd of several colours; she has a nobler air, and the gesture of a person studying to enterprize some great work in Painture. Erato has piercing eyes, & a very pleasant aspect; at her feet are seen divers Musical instruments, and a little Cupid crown'd with flowers, holding before her an ancient fashion'd harp, such as they report Orpheus sometimes made use of to save himself. But to manifest the ingenuity of the Painter, I must tell you they have no wings, as Clio has who helps to conduct Fidelity into heaven; because he would intimate hereby, that they ought to stay eternally in the glorious sanctuary Cleonymus has given them. The Painter has also feign'd that they made two Pieces of needle-work representing their two Victories over the Pierides and the Syrens; but this is done with so much art that it cannot be sufficiently commended. Besides, all that I have related, all the ornaments which Painture and Sculpture have invented are seen in this place. For in divers places, where the order of Architecture permitted, are vizards, garlands, urns, sphinxes, and several other things. But it is remarkable that there is not one but has some Mystery, intimating the virtues or glory of Cleonymus to such as understand the meaning given to such various figures. So that the Painter cannot be too much commended who has so well fanci'd and finish'd so good a design, wherein appears Invention, Judgment, Boldness, and good Sense. It is manifest throughout that he is not only a great Imitator of Nature, but also understands the Art of embellishing; and that his imaginations surpass her Productions. All that is seen in these rare Pictures alike delight the Eyes and the Reason. Never were Light and Shadow so judiciously dispos'd, never was the sight deceived after a more agreeable manner. All the little Cupids are excellently done, the Head-tires of the Muses are admirable, the Draperies are perfectly well su'd, Modesty is visible even in the Figures, which the Painter has habited very negligently. The Objects which appear nearest, deceive the Eyes; the more remote surprise the Imagination: in fine, all the workmanship both of the Hall and the two Chambers, deserves more commendations than can be given it. But now not to stay to tell you of the Cabinet, or all the other apartments of this proud Palace, wherein are a thousand handsome objects, with which the famous Meleander has embellish'd it, either by his workmanship or a thousand ingenious inventions which cannot be express'd, I must return into the stately Hall, and describe to you the Gardens of so goodly a Place. But I must tell you first, that the face of the house on this side is very different from the former; so is the Perroon, but withal stately and commodious. The Moats are environ'd with rails too as the other; and from hence you discover so great and vast an extent of several green-plats, so many large and handsome Walks, so many spirting Fountains, and so many delightful objects which become confus'd by their distance, that you scarce know what you see, because the multitude of agreeable sights amazes the imagination, and hinders the eyes from fixing upon any at first. For curiosity being a natural sentiment, we do not so much mind that which we might easily discern, as that which we cannot distinguish; so true it is that we love to discover things to our selves. 'Tis to be observ'd that this Garden lies between two Groves which agreeably arrest the Eyes: but to describe it to you part by part, I must tell you, that when you are at the end of the Bridge, you see at a good distance towards the right hand and the left two spiriting Fountains standing in two very solitary corners, and seeming to hide themselves; and before you, great Green-plats with Fountains, a round Pond in the middle, and on either side in the nearest squares three Fountains, whose artificial water-works agreeably divert the eyes, especially one towards the left hand, where is seen a crown of fruit-bushes (if I may so speak.) The Basin of it is rustick enough, but you would say it is sufficiently adorn'd with its own agreeableness. About the round Pond I mention'd are four little Cupids holding scallop-lavers upon their heads, from which the water falls with a continual murmur into little squares environ'd with green. On each side of the Pond are seen great green squares which reach to the two Groves, and have fountains in them also. On the right hand is seen at a good distance a cullis'd-Gate leading into a rustick Orchard, and on the left a Cascade representing a kind of grate of Water, to correspond to the true grate which is opposite to it. Beyond the Pond you descend by another Perroon, and have two conduits casting forth water on the right hand. In this place at the crossing of a Walk stand four handsom Statues; but to increase the delightfulness, a little further in that Walk are two little Torrents with Jets of water at several distances one into another which look like a Balustrade of crystal running on both sides of the Walk. And nothing is more pleasant than to hear the murmurs of all these Jets of water, whose equality of delightful harmony is very apt to produce an agreeable amusement. When you are at the end of this Walk, you find a large square of water, and discover a little solitary place, above which stands a small wild Grove. Directly before you, you see a great and handsom spectacle which I shall describe to you by and by, and on the right side of the Mount which I am to describe, Vines and divers other Country objects. Beyond that great square of water you see an object perfectly surprising. For standing upon the Perroon which leads further downwards, you see a fair stream of water from which a hundred Jets issue with an equal force, and falling again into the Channel make an agreeable murmur. And a little beyond, you see another less, which may be call'd a Walk of Crystal. For there are an infinite number of Jets of water in a double rank, which crossing one another make an extreme delightful shew. Nevertheless, this is not the goodliest ornament of this place; for below this Walk of Crystal you see a long Terrass of good height, four long rows of scallop-lavers full of water, of unequal bigness, which exonerating one into another make you see a hundred torrents at once, and at length discharge themselves into a great stream of water, from whence issue fifty other Jets with violence. Next you come to see a great and large Channel made by a River which was scarce known before Cleonymus chose this admirable Desert for a retreat to recreate his mind from his honourable employments. It precipitates it self like a mighty torrent, and then having calmly pass'd through the whole breadth of the Garden of Valterra, it goes forth by a Cascade, and afterwards loses it self in the Meadows. So that in a very little space it is a River, Torrent, Channel, Cascade, and Brook. But to render this place more marvellous, you see beyond, an Abyss of water (if I may so speak) in the midst of which by the directions of Meleander has been plac'd a figure of Galea with a Cyclops playing on a bagpipe, and divers Tritons round about him; all these figures cast forth water, and make a very handsome sight. There are also other water-works in this

this place; and several spirting fountains. But which is most agreeable, all this great extent of water is cover'd with little painted and gilded Boats, and from thence you enter into the Channel. Now you must know that on the side opposite to the Cascade I mention'd, there is cut out a great Mount in a direct line, which is made in a Terras with a Balustrade, supported by six Terms or Pillars. Between which are artificial Rocks always cover'd with water, and at the foot of these Rocks is a kind of little Chanel into which that water trickles agreeably. On the right side of these Rocks the Tyber is represented, as Rivers use to be, that is, half lying along and leaning upon his Urn; but he seems melancholy, as if he were discontented for being surpass'd by the River of the place, which is seen represented on the other side with a cheerful and pleasant aspect. But I must not forget to tell you that in these Channels and the abyss of water are seen Statues upon great Pedestals representing the several parts of the world, having in them the most precious things of the Countrys which they represent, which they carry as it were to pay tribute; to denote that the whole earth has contributed to embellish this place. But the better to enjoy the sight and admire so many handsome objects at once, you must ascend up the Mount by two stately Perroons made like an Amphitheatre, which have also six very goodly fountains of different forms. About the midst, at the Base of the Balustrade are seen two great Lyons, which by Meleander's contrivance shew after a particular manner the Arms of Cleonymus; for the Squirrel is seen between the paws of the Lyons, but so that 'tis manifest these cruel Animals have nothing but gentleness and kindness for it. When you come to the end of the Mount a large green round of water surprises you, in the midst of which arises as by miracle a Jet of water fifty feet high, of so prodigious and extraordinary a greatness, that it would seem a thick pillar of Crystal, if the motion did not convince the eyes. And to denote that it is the last piece of this great and excellent workmanship, there is plac'd beyond it a handsome statue of Hercules resting himself after all his Labours which are represented in sculpture upon the Pedestal. In this place seats are built to behold so many rare things the more commodiously, which appear so much the more excellent, for that from thence also divers plain and rustick objects are seen. For on both sides you see two rude prospects and a little Temple amongst the Trees. This Mount has Walks on each side, and grass in the middle, and from thence you have a fairer sight of the building than from any other place, with the two back-wings which belong to it, the two Garden-plats which are on both sides, the vast compass of the great Garden between the two Groves, all the divers spirting Fountains, the Channels, the Squares of Water, the Cascades, and those too which are on the side of the Garden for Flowers, which is before one of the Wings. Hence also is discovered a thing which has been happily invented by the famous Meleander; for whereas Cleonymus has several ancient rarities, and especially two Figures of Stone, which are said to have serv'd for the Sepulture of the first Kings of Libya; in a little irregular corner of ground he has caus'd two Pyramids to be built, in imitation of those which are near Memphis; to the end to place in them all such kind of rarities as he possesses. So that the sight of these Pyramids together with that of so many excellent and different objects takes away all thought of regretting that this place has not one of those prospects in which Rivers and Seas are discover'd, and in which the eyes are oftner wearied than diverted. For every thing that is seen in this admirable Defart is agreeable, the eyes cannot stray but with delight. Nevertheless, you must not imagine that I have describ'd all the Beauties of this place to you; for I am confident I have omitted very many; and besides, to speak truth, Valterra is but in its infancie (if I may so speak) and there will be so much difference between what it is now, and what it will be one day, as there is between a fair Virgin when she is but twelve years old and when she is eighteen. And yet 'tis hard to imagine that any thing can be added to it; and when any one walks there, he so forgets himself that he cannot retire. Indeed (as it is fit to return to the source of things) in this Garden one cannot but think with pleasure on the worth and virtue of him that has render'd it such as it is, who in his great employments has display'd all the grand Qualities of his wit and courage; and who by his justice, humanity, and magnificence has found the art to oblige the happy and miserable, and to be the Protector of all virtuous persons, ill-treated by fortune, as well as of the Sciences and excellent Arts.

Ha! Theanor (said Amilcar perceiving he had done speaking) I am infinitely oblig'd to you for having so well describ'd Valterra; I confess, I am charm'd with it; the beauties of the Vally of Tempe are not comparable to those you have describ'd, the Country of Elis has nothing that approaches them; Athens, Corinth, Thebes, Carthage, Babylon, and Rome have nothing so admirable; nor does all the Earth afford a more excellent place. But how rare soever it be, I should rather chuse to have the mind and capacity of Cleonymus than his fair House.

After this, Emilius having confirm'd that which Theanor had related, they went to Horse again. But because they had stay'd a very long time in that place they were overtaken by night. So that in the midst of a thick Wood Amilcar unawares separated himself from Theanor and Emilius. He stray'd two or three miles; but at length the Moon rising, he found the right way again, and saw he was not far from Præneste which he perceiv'd upon the top of a hill. Which hill has this particularity, that being environ'd with divers others less high, all their tops seem to form a kind of a Crown, which makes a very handsome sight; and therefore some affirm that this place was heretofore call'd Stephane which signifies a Crown; and others Polystephane which signifies in Greek many Crowns; for Præneste was of a Greek foundation, and built (as the inhabitants pretend) by a son of Ulysses and Circe; but others ascribe its foundation to another cause. But be it how it will, Amilcar arriving there observ'd the hope of Peace began to revive commerce; for there was an infinite number of strangers there, and all places appointed for the lodging of such as came to consult the Lots were so full, that he could not be entertain'd there. So he went to the Quarters of Telantus, who receiv'd him very civilly, and there he found one of the most intimate Friends of the illustrious Amalthea, whose name was Cleontus son of the sage Timantus, and who by his virtue and a thousand excellent Qualities deserv'd the esteem of all that knew him. And therefore Amilcar was very joyful to see him and embrace him. I did not think (said Telantus, observing in what manner they convers'd together) two persons of so contrary humors, humors, could have been such pleasant company together. No, no (answer'd Amilcar) do not deceive your self by appearances: Cleontus has indeed a serious air, a wise, and sufficiently melancholy deportment; but for all this seeming coldness, if you consider his eyes well, you will oftentimes see a judicious smile there, which will convince you that he does not hate mirth in another so much as you believe. I know well (added he) he is more Philosopher than I, he passes better with solitude, he would Sacrifice all the pleasures of the world for glory, and will have Reason be absolute Mistress of his life. But for all this he complies with such a friend as I; and though he suffers not folly in his own heart, yet he suffers it in that of a Friend, provided it be innocent and agreeable; in a word, it may be said Cleontus is capable of being whatever he pleases. He would be very apt to be extremely amorous if he pleas'd, he would be ambitious if he were minded, he is learned because he would be so, he makes Verses as well as Anacreon, he is able to make Laws of Friendship; and, in fine, I know nothing which he could not discharge with applause. But wisdom (added Amilcar) is his Master-piece. He might be even as violent as Timantus, though he appears always serene, but he likes better to preserve an even and an equal temper, which indeed is very amiable. You see (answer'd Cleontus smiling) that to verifie what you say, I hear my own praises quietly; but to divert you from them, I will inform you that the charming Niece of Amalthea is married, and I was at a little Feast which preceded her Nuptials, and was the most jovial one in the world. I beseech you (said Amilcar) make me understand all that you know of that charming person. She has married (answer'd Cleontus) a man of high Quality, who is tall, well proportion'd, and has a very good aspect; he is call'd Perianthus; he began to go to the War in the fourteenth year of his age, so that though he is yet but two and twenty, he has serv'd eight Campaigns already with honor. In the first encounter he was present at, he was wounded and taken prisoner; but this did not discourage him, but on the contrary, he lov'd glory the better. But it is not to be wonder'd that he is couragious, of a brave genius, and mov'd with a great number of excellent Qualities, for he is son of a man whose reputation for Valour and Gallantry is known over all the World; and in fine, that fair Clarissa could not have a better match. I am very glad to understand this agreeable news (reply'd Amilcar) but to speak freely, I cannot believe that a Marriage-Feast could have been agreeable; therefore you will do me a pleasure to tell me the manner of that you speak of. I will content your curiosity (answer'd Cleontus) Imagine then, that there was a Galeot painted, gilded, and adorn'd with Streamers, in which there was an Anti-chamber and a Chamber curiously painted and gilded. The pavement of the Chamber of the Poope was white blew, the Tapistry green and silver. The Company was in these three places, and the Musick was towards the Prow. We departed from the City about evening, and went to a fair House belonging to the Young Prince of Syracusa; where we arriv'd a little before night. There we were entertain'd with a sumptuous feast, in which was both order and abundance; after which we walk'd in the Gardens by the noise of fountains which was mix'd with Musick and Discourse, and for a happy presage of this Love, it thunder'd and lightned as long as the Company was upon the way returning home: and which was remarkable, as soon as we were arriv'd, there follow'd a terrible rain; so that it may be said Heaven had a kind respect for us. The great commendation of this Feast was, it had nothing at all of Ceremony, no more than the Marriage-day. For this second Feast was made with such order and magnificence in the stately Palace of Amalthea, that never was any seen better contriv'd. Since that admirable Lady had the ordering of it (answer'd Amilcar) I believe all that you say; for she can never do any thing-but what is worthy to be admir'd. But I admire her chiefly for the choice of her friends, for certainly the sentiments of people are best known thereby; and according to the humor I am of, I should more glory in being the friend of Amalthea, than the Favorite of a great King, that had no exquisite judgment.

After this Amilcar inquir'd concerning Berelisa, Clidamira, and Anacreon, and then of Mutius who was the occasion of this journey. As for Berelisa and Clidamira (answer'd Telantus) they are in perfect health; but they have not consulted the Lots yet, because 'tis the custom to Sacrifice first. And as for Anacreon, he was made an Ode since he came hither, which is without doubt a very excellent one; the subject of it, is, That riches avail nothing against death. But, for Mutius, I can give you no information concerning him: not that 'tis impossible that he may be here without my knowing it; for so great a number of people have arriv'd within these two days, that he may easily be here and I not know so much. But if he is (added he) I shall soon know it; for to morrow all that would know their Destinies write their names; and so I promise you to give you an account in a little time. After this, Telantus thank'd Amilcar for having given him the knowledge of Berelisa, Clidamira, and Anacreon; for since Fortune first drew unhappy persons to Praneste, there never arriv'd any here, whose conversation has been more charming; so that Berelisa and Clidamira have already been visited by all the Virtuoso's of the City. Amilcar then having a new impatience to see these two amiable persons, motion'd to Telantus to go thither after supper; and he not opposing the proposal, they went together to visit them. By the way, they met with Anacreon, who joyn'd himself with them: but when Amilcar enter'd into Berelisa's chamber, he was much surpris'd to see so fair and great a company there; for there were eight or ten very amiable women, and almost as many men of quality, whose air and physiognomy spoke them ingenious, and in a corner an old Thascan Soothsayer, who was entertaining himself amongst this great company. Berelisa and Clidamira were very joyful to see Amilcar, and testifi'd as much to him in words extreme obliging. Their looks no doubt at first askt him news of Artemidorus; but their mouths enquir'd of the generous action of Clelia, of which they had already heard some confus'd report. Amilcar satisfi'd their curiosity; and to content them absolutely, he employ'd his discourse so, as that he many times nam'd Artemidorus, and that in such a way, as gave them to understand that he was in better health than when they left Rome; he also found means to deliver a Letter of that Prince to Berelisa without being observ'd. But after this, Amilcar a little more exactly consider'd all this fair company than he had done: 'Tis certainly my good fortune which brought me hither (said he) and I account it so much the better (added he) because I find more than I expected.

expected. For I imagin'd, none but unfortunate people with melancholy faces were to be found at Præfeste; and yet I see fair persons here, who have bright and sparkling eyes, and agreeable aspects; and men who have not the countenances of the unhappy. If all unfortunate persons had pale complexions, sunk eyes, and a melancholy air (answer'd Anacreon) not only this company which appears to you so fair, would not be such, but all the world would seem terrible. For they who have no infelicities make themselves some; and from the greatest Kings in the world to the most miserable slaves, all complain and murmur against Fortune: 'tis in vain that she makes presents to men; they turn her favours into poyson, they have that within themselves which destroys their felicity, and seeking it always without, they take no care to find it in their own hearts. Yet methinks (said Amilcar) all that is needful to make men happy is in the Universe: but 'tis certainly (added he) their extravagant desires transposing the order of things, cause them to be disgusted with what they enjoy, and to wish that which they have not. That which you see is true (answer'd Telanius) but yet something further must be added to it: for the cause that there are so few people happy, is, because men make desires to themselves which Nature alone does not give them. What I say to you (added he) I say to my self, and against my self; since 'tis true that almost all men do not busie themselves only in seeking such things as they have need of, and are fit for them, but chiefly such as they believe the opinion of the world requires them to seek. So that without confining themselves to follow Reason alone, they desire to content that famous Chimera call'd Opinion, and mind more what will be said of them if they do not advance themselves above their Ancestors, than their own quiet. How many men are there which would be contented with the patrimony of their fathers, if they did not think that their relations, their neighbours, and all that knew them, would esteem them less in an indifferent than in a high fortune? and nevertheless these people who seek so much to content the opinion of others, desire a thing impossible. For Opinion is the most mutable thing in the world; and if you would know how different the opinions of men are, it needs only to oblige all that are present to make Wishes; and I am confident, if all those that compose this company, speak sincerely, you will observe so great a diversity of opinions amongst them, that you know it is sufficiently difficult to be capable of happiness. But seeing there is so great a variety of sentiments (said Berelisa) how then can there be any certain opinion which is establish'd in the world, and thenceforth holds the place of a Law? 'Tis because the multitude of men (answer'd Amilcar) is so great, that there cannot be so great a number of contrary opinions as of men. So that such as resemble one another being united, there results from them a certain general opinion in every Nation, which prevails over the rest. But this does not hinder but that even they who compose this opinion have opinions in a manner peculiar to themselves. For my part (said Clidamira) I do not believe that if all the company were oblig'd to wish something, you would find so great a diversity of wishes as you imagine: for I am perswaded all the Ladies would wish for great beauty, and almost all the men to reign in some part of the world, and to be Kings. I do not agree to what you say (answer'd Amilcar) for as for my part, I speak sincerely, I would not be a King; and I should account it more noble to wish to be worthy to be one; besides, I know Royalty has a thousand consequences enemies to liberty, which would strangely disgust me. For it must be had in mind, that Kings can never do anything but what will be known, that the least of their actions is publick, that they can scarce ever discern those who love their condition from such as love their persons, that they seldom know the truth unless they divine it; that ceremony attends them every where; that they are always encompassed with self-interested flatterers; that they never have any great pleasures but openly, which to prudent persons are many times great troubles: not to reckon the cares requir'd to the well-governing of a State, or the shame there is in governing it ill. But, which chiefly makes me averse to be a King, is the thought, that it would never be permitted me to be idle. And yet an idle life has something so sweet in it, that I could never resolve to renounce idleness, as I ought to do, to reign with glory. For if an idle Gallant were a King, and enjoy'd the same idleness, he would be a good-for-nothing, unworthy of his dignity. Wonder not then, amiable Clidamira, if I am not of your mind. For my part (said Anacreon) if I may advise, every one of us shall wish something according to our inclinations, and we will leave Amilcar the liberty to condemn or approve the wishes we shall make; and after every one has declar'd their wishes, he shall tell his own. I account this proposal of Anacreon a very agreeable motion (said Berelisa.) After which, all the company having approv'd it, Amilcar said he would do as he was desir'd; and turning himself towards a man of quality of Tarquinius, who was next him towards his right hand, he ask'd him what he wish'd. To be as rich as I would (answer'd he) for we have no desires but we may satisfy with riches. You should have added, (answer'd Amilcar) to be rich without being covetous: for without this circumstance, your wish, in stead of rendering you happy, would render you the slave of your treasures. For my part (said Clidamira) I am in haste to tell that I would wish to be without contradiction the handsomest person in the world. You ought withal to have wish'd to be always such (answer'd Amilcar) for I think there is nothing more difficult than for a person that has been perfectly a Fair, to inure her self to bear contentedly the decay of her beauty: and besides, you wish a thing impossible, when you wish to be without contradiction the handsomest person in the world; for every body judges of beauty according to their particular fancy; so that none can be universally acknowledg'd for the handsomest person in the world: moreover, amiable Clidamira, you would have a reign of too few years: for the greatest beauty passes very swiftly away; and I account you more happy, to be infinitely charming, than to be infinitely handsome. You see (added he, smiling) I believe your words more than my own eyes; for if I gave credit to them, I should tell you that you enjoy what you wish'd, and are the handsomest person in the world. However it be (said she) if you please, ask Berelisa what she wishes. To be very well lov'd, and not to love at all, or not much (answer'd she, beholding Clidamira.) Ha! charming Berelisa (answer'd Amilcar) you make the most unjust wish in the world: for what pleasure would you have in being lov'd, if you did not love? consider therefore, I beseech you, and make a more equitable wish. For my part (said a man of condition of Valterra, who had a pale countenance and a languishing air) I

I should wish to be always in most perfect health. Your wish is assuredly very good (answer'd Amilcar) for health is the beginning of all pleasures : but when it is alone, 'tis a benefit we are not too sensible of, and sometimes serves only to cause us more ardently to wish all the other pleasures which we cannot enjoy. For my part (said one of his friends who was next him, and had the meen of a brave man) I should like well enough to be one of those subduers of Monsters, like Hercules, who run through all the world with their swords in their hands, destroy Gyants, fight with Lyons, deliver ravisht Ladies, conquer Cities, relieve Kingdoms, and who though they travel without train or equipage, never have need of any thing. This is no doubt sufficiently pleasant (answer'd Amilcar) and if Herminius were here, he would be of this sentiment ; for he loves to do good to all the world ; and he hates injustice so much, that he would take great delight in causing equity to reign every where, without having need of anything besides himself. But having well thought upon it, I find it sufficiently difficult ; and he is not a subduer of Monsters that desires it, for all Monsters will not always suffer themselves to be subdu'd. As for me (said a Lady who had a very agreeable countenance and a melancholy air) I should wish to be always with persons whom I love, and never to see others. I perceive, Madam (said Amilcar to her) you cannot but have a tender heart, and I assure my self you would not have been sorry that these Verses had been made for you.

*Let me my lovely Iris sighs but hear,
And circumscribe all my desires in her ;
Let me in gentle peace with her abide,
I care for nought the Sun surveys beside.*

I confess it (answer'd she) for I know nothing so sweet as always to see what we love, and nothing so troublesome as scarce ever to see those who sensibly affect our hearts. I cannot say (reply'd Amilcar) but your wish is very agreeable ; however, a little variety does very well. For my part (said Anacreon) I will include a thousand wishes in one, and wish to be sensible of all pleasures without exception, since without this life has no sweetness, the source of all pleasures being in the heart of those that receive them. For in vain should an excellent Musician sing, if his hearers have not delicate ears to understand him well. For my part (said Amilcar) I think it would have been better to desire to enjoy all pleasures, than to wish to be barely sensible or capable of them ; but every one wishes according to his fancie. As for me (added Telantus) I am constrain'd to confess that I am sensible only of glory and pleasure, and between the two, if my Reason is for one, my heart is for the other ; therefore not being able to determine my self, I would only desire nothing. This wish is very Philosophical (answer'd Amilcar) and one would think it were the most reasonable in the world ; because he that desires nothing has need of nothing. But after having well consider'd it, I conclude that a man that should desire nothing, would pass his life in such excessive tranquillity, that it something approach near insensibility. Therefore this wish shall never be mine. As for me (said a person of the Country roughly, who had a quick imagination and a rude briskness) I should wish to have the best wit in the world. Alas ! (answer'd Amilcar hastily) you know not well what you defire, when you wish to be a fine wit, there is nothing more decry'd in the world at present, and I had rather be a slave than a rare wit. They that are such with judgment, conceal it ; they who have not wherewith to support this Quality, are so impertinent in it, that except such as laugh at them, no body desires their conversation. Not but that I consent with all my heart thereto if you are desirous to be such (added Amilcar, looking upon him who made this wish) and it is only requisite that you tell us what kind of fine wit you would be ; for there some of the first order, others secondary ; some of the Court, others of the City and the Country, and some fine wits too among the meaner people. Speak then if you please, to the end I may understand your wish, and know a little more precisely whether I ought to approve or condemn it. For being I am at this time Censor of the wishes of the Company, it behoves me to acquit my self punctually of the Office. Amilcar spoke this with a certain serious air which caus'd all that heard him to laugh, and which so struck the poor wit out of countenance, that he answer'd so softly as no body scarce heard his answer. Wherefore Amilcar turning towards a man of Perusia of a handsome personage, ask'd him what he wish'd ? Not to be in love (answer'd he.) Believe me (reply'd Amilcar roughly) you had better wish to be dead ; for to speak truth, to live without Love is a very uncomfortable life. I believe that which you say (answer'd another man of Clusium) and I know it by experience ; and therefore I would with all my heart be always amorous. But I have endeavour'd it these four years unprofitably, and I have su'd above a hundred times to a person whom I once lov'd ;

*Give me my Love and my desires again,
And I therewith my pleasures shall regain.*

But he that is amorous (reply'd the other) cannot spend one day without discontent. But he that loves nothing (said the man of Clusium) is incapable of any sensible pleasure. Be it how it will (said Amilcar) I account the last with more reasonable than the other ; because the first overthrows the order of the World ; and opposes Nature which inspires Love into all the Universe. But to proceed (added Amilcar, addressing to a handsome Lady of Praneste) What is your wish ? To have many true Friends (answer'd she) for I imagine there is nothing so sweet. You should have desir'd (said Amilcar) that there were such, and then that you had them : therefore, if you believe me, desire rather to have many Lovers ; for with those eyes of yours it will be easier for you to have Lovers than friends. But when we have Lovers (answer'd she) they forsake us. But when we believe we have Friends (reply'd Amilcar) we find oftentimes that we have not ; but to speak truth (added he) there is deceit in every thing. As for what concerns me (said another Lady) I would wish to see that which is in the hearts of all the world. No doubt there would be pleasure enough (answer'd Amilcar) in penetrating into the hearts of such as have an outside of wisdom, and a thousand follies hidden in their Souls ; of those hypocrites who make semblance of having virtue, and make use of it only to hide their vices ; of those coy Gossips in appearance who are unfaithful to their husbands ; of those deceitful Friends, who intend to destroy those they Careless most ; and of those Wantons

Wantons who have a thousand little Loves at a time : but withal you would see so many follies, wickednesses, frauds, and treacheries, that I think it better to wish to know ones own heart well than those of others. For my part (said a man with a fierce aspect) I should wish to be the most valiant man in the world; And I to be the most eloquent (added another.) Eloquence and Valour (answer'd Amilcar) are two excellent things; but 'tis good to wish at the same time to know how they ought to be us'd; for to speak truth, they are a strange sort of people who understand nothing but killing of men; and I am much of the sentiment of those of Agrirentum, who have a Proverbial saying amongst them, That Valour is like salt, good for nothing by it self, and yet good for almost all things. But as for Eloquence, it is not less necessary to know the right use of it: for an Eloquent person who declaims always in conversation is very troublesome; and as often as any one wishes Eloquence, he ought to remember to wish judgment with it. As for me (said a Greek who was present) I should much desire to write such excellent things as I might believe would descend to Posterity, and that with glory; and I am assur'd, if Anacreon who hears me would speak truth, he would confess that the thought of being one day translated into various Languages and commended in several Ages, is infinitely sweet to him. I assure you (answer'd Anacreon smiling) if you knew that pleasure by experience, you would not account it so great as you imagine; for at the same instant that I think perhaps my Works will live a long time, I think perhaps I shall not, but shall infallibly live less than they. So that this chagrin strangely troubles the pleasure of this pretended immortality. Anacreon is very equitable in speaking as he does (said Amilcar) for those pleasures are properly the pleasures of fancy; not but that I know well 'tis almost a general weakness to affect to have our names live; but to speak truth, upon a serious consideration 'tis but a folly: for cannot we judge by what is said of those that have written before us, what will be said after us of those that write at this time? 'Tis true, they are sometimes commended, but yet they are blam'd at least as much as they are prais'd. They are robb'd, and ill translated, and besides, though it were not so, what concernment can we take in things which shall happen when we are no longer concern'd amongst the living? Believe me then, let us be contented with present pleasures, let us enjoy our glory whilst we live, let us seek to obtain the praises of such as are alive, and let us not care for being commended by people not yet in being, whom we know not and never can know. No doubt there are a thousand agreeable things in the Odes of Anacreon, which will not be understood two thousand years hence, because Manners, Customs, and Gallantry will be chang'd with the Ages. Nevertheless, I allow that people may by the by comfort themselves in some manner against Death, which the thought of having some privilege above the Vulgar, and leaving a name which does not die with them; but let us not account this amongst the most exquisite pleasures, nor so affirmatively ascribe to our selves an imaginary immortality, which perhaps posterity will not give us: for I assure you, every one does not live in this manner who desires it, and many people think they write for immortality, whose works will die. As for me (said a very amiable Virgin who was sister to that Lady of Præneste who had spoken before) I am confident my wish will please all the Company. Tell it quickly then (said Amilcar.) 'Tis to be invisible (answer'd she.) Ha! Madam (reply'd Amilcar) this is the first time no doubt that so fair a person as you made this wish. In good earnest (added she) I know nothing more agreeable than this. But what would you do with your invisibility? (said Amilcar smiling.) I would make use of it (answer'd she) to know the secrets of all the World, and especially to know truly what they who do not love me speak of me. As for my part (reply'd Amilcar) I have no curiosity to know what my Enemies say, for I easily imagine it. But I confess to you, I should be ravish'd to know that my Friends spoke of me in the same manner when I am not with them as when I am. For experience has taught me, there are few people but upon some occasions make railery upon their Friends, or at least endure to hear it made in their presence. Yet this is very culpable (answer'd Berelisa.) But when we have Friends (said Clidamira) who have certain natural defects which cannot be conceal'd (as deformity, or the like) what ought we to do? Never speak of them (answer'd Berelisa.) But if others speak of them (reply'd Clidamira) 'tis necessary to agree with them. When we cannot contradict them (answer'd Berelisa) we must blame them of injustice in accusing vertuous persons of defects not in their power to amend, rather than to commend them for a thousand good Qualities they are indu'd with: and thereupon we ought to take occasion to praise them, and exaggerate all that is commendable in them; for there is nothing more unworthy and unjust than to upbraid any one with his natural defects. However it be (said Amilcar) let us return to invisibility, of which various uses may be made. One might thereby be present at all the Councils of Kings, and Master of the secrets of all the world; and nothing besides the thoughts alone could escape the knowledge of an invisible person. It would be good in affairs of State and War, but chiefly in Gallantry; for we might deceive all Husbands, Mothers, Aunts, and Rivals: but being by ill hap, this wish is one of the most difficult wishes in the world to be accomplish'd, let us see what the remainder of the Company wishes. For my part (said a man of Ardea, who was very rich and ingenious) I would wish to have no Envyers. You would then (answer'd Amilcar) have no virtue, be poor, deformed, and miserable; for whoever has good fortune, merit, and virtue, has Envyers infallibly. As for me (said an amiable person, who sat next Berelisa) I should wish more to be an accomplish'd man than an accomplish'd woman. As for this wish (answer'd Amilcar) I find nothing to say against it; for though women are infinitely more amiable than men, and I love them a thousand times better, yet, I judge, Madam, that you have wish'd very judiciously: for were there no other reason than that which allows us to use Courtship and Gallantry, and forbids it you, I should account your wish very just. For my part (added another Lady) I should like well of immortality. I am wholly of your mind (answer'd Amilcar) and this wish is the best of all; for it would be great pleasure to see the whole Universe continually change, being unalterable ones self. But to speak truth, this happiness appears so impossible, that I have not the power to wish it; and all that I can say, is, that this immortality is to be prefer'd to that of Writings. You have reason (reply'd a man who had the whole air of a profess'd Scholar of which the world is full) therefore without wishing immortality which belongs to the Gods alone, I should wish only to be very learned, and to be able to understand all Nature. For there would be great pleasure in a perfect knowledge of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, in penetrating into the Centre of the Earth, there to the production of gold, in knowing the Qualities and Virtues of Minerals, Plants, Herbs, and being skill'd even in the knowledge of the least Cockles in the Sea, and the least Flies upon the Earth: great trees, shrubs, monsters, domestick Animals, Seas, Rivers, Brooks and Fountains, and to be ignorant of none of all Natures operations. That which you say is admirable (answer'd Amilcar) but though this wish is one of the best that can be made, yet it ought not to be abus'd. For I once knew a man, who understood as well as possible the situation and course of the Stars, who admirably knew Simples, who discours'd very well of the nature of Winds, who had observ'd that the salt of Agrigentum contrary to the manner of all other salt of the world, hardens in the Water, and melts in the Sun; that there are Pismires in certain Countries like Elephants; who discours'd very well of the Rainbow, who knew even the particularities of the love of Crocodiles; and who for all this, was a sottish man, his mind was always in Heaven, or the Abyss of the Earth, or the bottom of the Sea, to find out the secrets of Nature, and never was where it ought to be. He knew a hundred thousand things which were not necessary, but knew not that his wife was a wanton; and in fine, he was ignorant in morality and the art of living decently in the world; which is a thousand times more necessary to be known than the love of Crocodiles. All the Company having laugh'd at what Amilcar said, some time pass'd without any wishing; but at length a very accomplish'd man of Ceres said his wish was more reasonable than that of all the rest, since he wish'd nothing but to be lov'd by that which he lov'd. This wish is very reasonable (answer'd Amilcar) but being you seem sufficiently worthy to be lov'd, you might rather have made another wish, and left it to your merit to cause you to obtain that which you desire. As for me (said a sprightly young person) I would wish to be able to live without sleep, for 'tis a great loss of time. I confess it (answer'd Amilcar) but however, though all the World sleeps every day, yet they have time enough to be weary, and therefore sleep, if you will take my Counsel. But that you may sleep with pleasure (added he smiling) and have delightful Dreams, suffer an accomplish'd man who does not displease you, to say to you every day, I love you, and no doubt you will find no cause to complain of sleep more. For my part (said a man of good years) I should greatly desire to be a wise Law-giver, like Solon, Lycurgus, Zamolxis, and divers others. This wish is something commendable (answer'd Amilcar) but I confess, if I were a great and illustrious Maker of Laws, I should have great regret in foreseeing that infallibly they would be ill observ'd; for there is such a great perverseness amongst men, that as soon as a Law is made, all that ought to follow it, seek only how to infringe it with impunity. And besides, to speak truth, I account it more glorious to obey the Law than to have made it; for it is much easier to command in such occasions than to obey; and moreover 'tis a general maxime, that good actions are worth more than good words. After this, there remain'd only Amilcar and the old Tuscan Soothsayer who had wishes to make. But this venerable old man would make no wish at all, and said men were too blind to know what good was fit for them: after which he continu'd to hear attentively what was said in the Company. It was then requir'd of Amilcar to make his wish as others had done. I will (answer'd he) but I must first see whether all the Company have wish'd: and so he taking writing-Tables, he set down on one side all the wishes of the Ladies, and on the other all those of the men, in this manner.

The Wishes of the Ladies.

To be the handsomest Person in the world.
To be extremely lov'd, and not love at all, or very little.
To be always with Persons one loves, and to converse with no others.
To see what is in the hearts of all the World.
To be invisible.
To be an accomplish'd man in stead of being an accomplish'd woman.
To be immortal.
To be able to live without sleep.

The Wishes of the Men.

To be a King.
To be as rich as one would.
To be always in health.
To be a subduer of Monsters like Hercules, and a Deliverer of Kingdoms and ravish'd Ladies.
To be sensible of all pleasures without exception.
To desire nothing.
To be the best Wit in the World.
Not to be amorous.
To be always in love.
To be the most valiant man in the World.
To be the most eloquent.
To be the author of ingenious composures which may descend to posterity.
To have no Enviars.
To be very Learned.
To be lov'd by whom we love.
To be a wise Law-giver.

When Amilcar had writ down all these Wishes, he first counted them, and then the whole company, and found there was none but himself to wish: wherefore being much urg'd to speak, he answer'd, that it was not a thing to be done with precipitation: for since (said he) the business is to make a Wish, I will make make one so great, that imagination cannot go beyond it, for to think to desire one thing which may suffice to render a man happy, is a strange mistake. Therefore to make a handsome Wish, I will make a handsome story, and tell you in particular how I would be if I were master of my Destiny and events. Assuredly (said Clidamira) he is going to wish to be lov'd by an hundred thousand fair persons at once. Pardon me, Madam (answer'd Amilcar) I am not; and I declare to you, that I renounce my debonair humor for an hour only, and am going to speak sincerely to you, and in the greatest earnestness in the world. Know then, that for a more noble reason than that I mention'd at the beginning of this conversation, though I could dispose my lot as I pleas'd, I would not be born a King: for I account it no great glory to do no more but succeed a father, and I think it is something more sweet for a man to be the builder of his own grandeur, and to owe nothing but to himself. You would then be a conqueror (reply'd Clidamira) which many times signifies an Usurper. By no means (said Amilcar) and I have at present a greater fancy than that: but I beseech you suffer me to speak, my friend, and then let the company judge of my Wish. Know then, I would be neither King nor conquering Usurper; but as for birth, I would be of a Royal race, and that the changes which arrive successively in the world, had my family, and left me scarce any other advantage besides nobility of blood; I would be also descended of vertuous Parents, and be indu'd with great vertue my self. I confess too I would be a handsome personage, have a noble air, a happy physiognomy, and a very high aspect. As for Wit, I would have an infinite portion, but especially of that of the chief order, capable of great things, of governing Nations, counselling Kings, and knowing all the interests of Monarchies, the means to manage great Wars, and the art of grand Negotiations, of penetrating into the secrets of all hearts; and above all, I would have the faculty of perswading, which is almost the most necessary of all, for one that is in the highest employments. I would also in the beginning of my life go to the War, and give proofs of my courage: and to raise my self a reputation on the sudden, I would have Fortune by some extraordinary way cause me to be between two Armies ready to joyn Battel; and that for the first essays of my address and eloquence, I had the pleasure to cause these two enemy-Armies to lay down their Arms, and the glory to establish peace between two great Princes. In the next place, I would wish there were a Kingdom which were the sanctuary of the Sciences and excellent Arts, in which there were a great and excellent Minister, who by a thousand glorious actions had merited the admiration of all the earth, to the end that being lov'd and esteem'd by him, I might of a sudden come to be consider'd in that great state. Moreover, I should take an extreme pleasure (if the Gods pleas'd that he di'd before me) that he left me to the King his Master as a faithful servant, and capable of assisting him to support the burden of affairs; and, to complete my happiness, I would that that King at his death left me the government of the young Prince which were to succeed him, together with that of the whole State. But to signalize my Government the more, I would have a great War to manage; and that shortly after the death of the King, there were divers Cities taken, and many Battels won. Yet I would not have Fortune always favourable to me, and have none but easie successes, and without obstacles. On the contrary, I would see my Victories on a sudden interrupted by some great Insurrection of the people: I would, I say, that the Commotion beginning in the heart of the State, I saw almost the whole Kingdom risen against me, and had a foreign and a civil War to manage at once. But in making this Wish, I would at the same time perfectly understand the art to yield sometimes to the Tempest, thereby to save the Ship from perishing; and be able to re-establish a general calm, and cause the young Prince I serv'd to reign with glory, without employing that bloody policy which is always follow'd with terror and dread. But after I had calm'd this great storm within the State, I would win a thousand new advantages over the foreign enemies, take many important Cities, and gain divers Battels; and then to crown all these grand actions with the most heroick action that ever was, I would after so many happy successes form the design of a Peace upon the field of Victory. But the more agreeably to surprise all the earth, I would make a great secret of this important negotiation, which should pass only between my self and the Minister of the King against whom the War was; and at length, when the Nations durst scarce hope a Peace, they should understand it was made. But for the conclusion of this peace, I would not be unwilling to be a while in some small Island conferring with the Minister of the enemies; to the end I might in that place see Nations, Princes and Kings await with ardency the resolutions which should be taken in that little corner of earth. Moreover, I would corroborate this Peace by a happy Marriage of the young King I serv'd, and a fair Princess daughter of the enemy-King; that so thenceforth I might see peace, plenty and pleasures return together, establish safety both on Land and Sea, reconcile to the interests of the State some illustrious Heroe whom Fortune had separated from them, and finally render the whole world happy. And to accomplish my own felicity, I would not marry at all, but I would there were a State in the world where the Prince reign'd by the election of the greatest and the wisest; and that I were advanc'd to that place, to reign there all the rest of my life. But I would also that that Sovereignty had some kind of authority over all others, and that I had power then to continue peace amongst all the Kings of the world. Thus not being born a King, I should reign innocently, and boast of having enjoy'd glory in all the different manners it can be possess.

Ah! Amilcar (cry'd the old sage Soothsayer, who had scarce spoken before) it belongs to you only to wish; I think you are inspir'd by heaven: for having consulted the Lots, to know what will be the destiny of Rome now Tarquin is expell'd thence, I have found that it will one day be subject to a man of the same name with one of the first ancestors of Romulus, to such a man as you desire to be, who shall be descended from the ancient Kings of Sicily. But this will not come to pass till a long time after Rome shall have been a triumphant Commonwealth, and shall have been once again govern'd by Sovereigns, amongst which many Heroes shall be counted. This man spoke thus with such Majestie, that himself seem'd really inspir'd, and his discourse made such an impression upon the minds of all that heard him, that they doubted not but what he said would one day be accomplish'd; and all the company confess'd that it was not possible to wish any thing more great and glorious, and that all their own wishes together deserv'd not to be compar'd to the destiny of that great man.

But

But whilst they were speaking thus, the old Soothsayer sat down again in his place, and return'd to his ordinary silence, without concerning himself longer in what the company discours'd of, which soon after broke up and retir'd. The next morning Amilcar went to the Temple of Fortune, of which he admir'd the beauty and magnificence. In divers parts of this Temple, this Goddess was seen represented in many various manners; and all round about it were seen great Tables in which all the events she uses to cause were pourtray'd, sometimes advancing the little, and depressing the great. In one place destroying Empires, in another founding Kingdoms, and appearing always very powerful and capricious. Amilcar guided by an old Priest, saw also a certain place at the bottom of the Temple, where through a door of graves he was shew'd a statue of Jupiter in his childhood sitting with Juno between the arms of Fortune, to which marry'd women paid great devotion. He was told that heretofore a man of great virtue was inspir'd to go break a huge stone, which after long deferring he did, though all the world laugh'd at him; and that he had no sooner touch'd the stone, but miraculously a great breach was made in it, at which issued forth the famous Lots which decide the Destinies of men. He was also told, that at the same time there was an Olive-tree from whence issu'd forth abundance of honey; from which Omens the Soothsayers foretold that these Lots would become very famous. It was added too, that the Soothsayers caus'd a Coffer to be made of that Olive-tree, wherein to inclose the Lots, which were nothing but a great number of little Oaken Tablets, ingrav'd with several distinct words in ancient Characters. But I beseech you (said Amilcar to him he convers'd with) what course do they take to consult these Lots? First, a Sacrifice is offer'd to Fortune (said he who instructed Amilcar) to request her to forget all the reproaches the persons have spoken against her; for it is presuppos'd men are so unjust, that there is not one, even of those to whom she gives most of the favours which are in her power, but sometimes in his life complains of her. 'Tis true (answer'd Amilcar) there is no Deity towards whom respect is so often lost, as this; and for my part, I confess, I have utter'd reproaches against her in four or five Languages, both in Verse and in Prose, and so I have great need of the Sacrifice you speak of. But what further is to be done, to consult the Lots? I have already told you (answer'd the other) that they are kept in a Coffer made of the Sacred Olive-tree I mention'd, and I shall add that this Coffer is plac'd at the feet of that Statue of Fortune which embraces young Jupiter, and that after the person has signify'd what he desires to know, a young Boy draws at a venture several of these Tablets upon which the distinct words are written. After which, the Child having placed them in a row, the Soothsayer who is to unfold the Lots, reads them, and there finds the fence which he unfolds; but with such exactness that it is miraculous.

Amilcar having thank'd him that had so well instructed him, observ'd that the Temple was divided by a great Balustrade or Rail; on one side of which were all the men, and on the other all the women, and at the upper end stood two Priests who writ the names of such as intended to consult the Lots concerning their Fortune. Now whereas Telantus had promis'd Amilcar to give him an account whether Mutius would cause his name to be written, he did not stay to behold the men, but only the Ladies to whom he might speak any thing over the Balustrade, it not being forbidden to speak in this Temple when the Sacrifice was not in hand. Wherefore he set himself to consider the number of fair Strangers whom he saw in that place: and being he stood somewhat near him who inquir'd and writ down the names, he could hear those which they pronounc'd; so that after having heard a very great number, he beheld a lovely Woman who arrested his eyes agreeably; and thereupon giving her ear, he heard that she was nam'd Aretaphile; and that she said she was of the Principality of Elis; for they are oblig'd to tell what Countrey they are of. Being desirous then to have some conversation with her, he observ'd she went and plac'd her self by the Balustrade about ten paces from him; and so he chang'd his station and went to salute her very civilly. I beseech you, Madam (said he to her in Greek) be pleas'd to give me liberty to ask you news of the Princess Elismonda, and I desire you tell me whether she be still as fair as she was on the day she gave the prizes at the Olympick Games. That Princess is still so young (answer'd Aretaphile) that her beauty cannot be diminished; and so I can assure you, she was never more fair and charming, and when I came away she was at a fair house belonging to the Prince of Elis, which is call'd the Valley of Cupids. After this Amilcar obtain'd the permission of this fair person to go and visit her. But when he turn'd his head, he was much astonish'd to see Lucilius, Herminius, Emilius, and Spurius entering into the Temple; for when he departed from Rome, they made no account to go to Præneste. He approacht towards them, and understood that Lucilius was sent by Porfenna to consult the Lots of Præneste concerning the present state of affairs; and he learnt by Herminius, that Emilius, Spurius, and himself being upon the point to have a Quarrel, Publicola had hinder'd them from fighting, and engag'd them to come to this place, declaring to them nevertheless, that he left Valeria absolute Mistress of her own destiny, and that he was so confident she would chuse equitably, that he believ'd the Gods would approve his choice and make their will known. After this these New-comers went to cause their names to be written; but at the same time Amilcar beheld a man of a good personage and in mourning attire enter into the Temple, and observ'd that Clidamira chang'd colour thereat, and Berolisa seem'd amaz'd to see him. In effect it was Moleonius, who having pass'd through Rome to see the Prince Artemidorus was come to Præneste, and accordingly caus'd his name to be written. Next, Amilcar beheld the jealous Damon with Acrisus; for Sicinus would not consult the Lots at Præneste. But at length when this great number of Strangers of both Sexes had caus'd their names to be written, a Sacrifice was offer'd by way of preparation to know the secrets of Fate the next day. As they were going out of the Temple, Telantus advertis'd Amilcar that the wicked Tullia had sent a man with great sums of money to corrupt him that was to expound the Lots, and cause him to give Lucilius such an answer as might persuade Porfenna to put Aronces and Clelia to death; but he assur'd him at the same time that nothing was to be fear'd, and that he to whom the address was made was a man of the most firm probity in the world. Amilcar trembled at this wickedness of Tullia, but he hop'd to draw advantage from it. He acquainted Herminius with the matter, and having understood by Telantus that Marinus did not present himself at the Temple, he went to the lodgings of Clidamira and Berelisa, where Meleontus arriv'd a moment after, for he did not think fit to accost them as they were going out of the Temple. As soon as he enter'd, Berelisa askt him for whom he wore mourning. For the Prince of Leontium, Madam (answer'd he.) How (reply'd Clidamira wholly surpris'd) is the Prince of Leontium dead? He is certainly (said Meleontus) but with so great regret for not having well enough treated Artemidorus and the Princess Lysone, that he commanded me at his death to come and testify his last sentiments to them. And accordingly I came to Rome to obey him, and to conjure the Prince Artemidorus to go and take possession of his Principality, to forget all things past, and to be my Protector. As he is very generous (added he) he has granted me all I desir'd of him, and charg'd me with two Letters which I deliver to you. In speaking this Meleontus gave one Letter of Artemidorus to Clidamira, and another to Berelisa. They both blusht as they receiv'd them, and could not refrain from beholding one another with an air a little jealous. But Berelisa's doubts excited by jealousy were soon dispell'd; for the Letter of the Prince Artemidorus was conceiv'd in these terms.

Telantus

Artemidorus to Berelisa.

THough the Prince my Brother had ill-treated me, I am notwithstanding much affected with his death: but now, Madam, that the Gods have given me power to testify to you how much I love you, I declare to you that I will not reign at Leontium but with you, and no other shall ever reign in my heart. I have writ to Clidamira in such a strain as will cure you of all your unjust jealousies. However, I desire you to promote Meleontus's interest with her; he has so well departed himself since the prince's death, that he deserves that you and I forget all the mischief he has done us. I beseech you, return to Rome as soon as you can; that when we have seen what will be the destiny of Arónces, I may go and cause you to be acknowledged princess of Leontium.

As Berelisa read this Letter, joy diffus'd it self from her eyes over all her countenance; and Clidamira, as she read hers, could not contain from blushing with choler; for it was almost in these words.

Artemidorus to Clidamira.

You have reason, Madam, to have made choice of Meleontus for the object of your affection; therefore I will do him what service I can to gain your favour towards him. I have understood from his mouth what I knew before, that he is not so unacceptable to you but that he may hope to be happy if I protect him.

I do so, Madam, and desire of you for him all the favours he is worthy of. I have formerly complain'd of it, and now I rejoyce at it; but there arrive so many other changes, that this ought not to surprize you. His fortune is sufficiently good, to render yours happy. Do not therefore resist his affection and my requests; but believe I can never be more oblig'd to you than I shall be, if you reward his affection in the manner I desire.

Clidamira made as if she read this Letter over again, but in truth, she only took time to calm the trouble of her mind, and to deliberate what she should do. During which she concluded that Berelisa was going to be Princess of Leontium, and that Artemidorus being fully perswaded that she had had a beginning of Courtship with Meleontus, no longer believ'd that it was only for his sake, as she had endeavour'd to perswade him. Wherefore, considering that if she rejected Meleontus she would be without all support, and being an admirable dissembler, she recollected her self suddenly, and beholding Meleontus with an aspect something confus'd but not at all rude, The Prince speaks so obligingly of you (said she to him) that it is manifest he will obtain what he desires; but however we shall speak of it at a little more leisure. In the mean time Herminius and Amilcar were speaking to Berelisa, who shew'd them Artemidorus's Letter, as being her dearest Friends at Rome. So that they were very joyful to see that Fortune had at length done justice to her merit. But after Meleontus, Herminius, and Amilcar were gone away, Clidamira not being able to suppress her sentiments, I imagine (said she to Berelisa) you care no longer for consulting the Lots of Praneste, and the Prince's Letter has given you whatever you account agreeable to your desires. 'Tis true (answer'd Berelisa) Artemidorus's Letter is such as I could desire, but I conceive that which you have received ought not to displease you; for, to give you what you made choice of, is as I conceive to do all that can be acceptable to you. Being you are yet but my sister in Law (reply'd Clidamira) and not Princess of Leontium, I must once in my life speak plainly to you, before I be oblig'd to bear you a respect which will not allow me to offend you. — But, no (added she) the manifestation of my anger will but augment your joy, and therefore I change my mind, and will never more speak to you of Artemidorus, whom I will endeavor to hate, or at least not to love longer. As I can never cease to consider you as the wife of my Brother (said Berelisa) I will answer you without passion. Joy wonderfully sweetens the mind (answer'd Clidamira) and you have not been always so gentle when you were discontented. But however (added she, as she was going from her into a Closet in the same Chamber) if I cannot be contented, I will at least make such shew of being so, that perhaps you who are really so, shall not seem so much. Berelisa smil'd at Clidamira's passion, and went into the Chamber which was assign'd to her.

The next morning Amilcar diligently enquir'd for Marinus, and could learn no tidings of him; only he understood that there was an unknown person who had sent to desire the favour that his name might not be written amongst the rest, but to be heard last, when the

the whole Ceremony of the multitude was finish'd; which could not be done in one day, there being too great a number of people this year in Praneste. At break of day the Temple of Fortune was open, and two hours were by favour allotted for such as would cause their names to be written in order to consulting the Lots, during which the Temple was fill'd with people to hear a kind of Hymn sung by a very excellent voice to the glory of Fortune. Whilst this was doing, a certain noise was heard about the Gate. Amilcar who had an universal curiosity turn'd his head and beheld a little Machine painted, gilded, and cover'd with a kind of little Canopy. It was surrounded with Curtains, and carried by two slaves. Upon the top of this Canopy was the Pourtraict of a young and handsome man. He had a round Visage, blew eyes, neat, and agreeable, a carnation, and fresh Complexion, and a cheerful and sprightly aspect. At the bottom of this Pourtraict were seen these Verses:

*Youthful and fair, this Picture courts your eye.
Youthful and fair as this, so once was I.
But envious Fate (by whose severe decree,
No happiness can great and lasting be)
So chang'd both face and body, there remains
Of both but one dire Magazine of pains.
A thousand ills my vexed limbs distort,
But I unmov'd sustain their rude effort.
Yet round the spacious Globe my name doth flie.*

The novelty of this Machine having surpriz'd all the Assembly, two Priests at the Gates of the Temple would have hindred the slaves that carried it, from passing; and requir'd him that was within it to descend and enter into the Temple. But a moment after, the Curtains were seen to open a little, and a voice something shrill but impetuous was heard to speak thus, No, no (said this Unknown) do not go about to cause me to descend, for 'tis in vain; and as people of high quality are seen to enter in Chariots into the Courts of Kings Palaces, so I have the privilege to enter into the Chambers of Queens and Temples; for that you may know me well, I am the prime sick person in the World, and he alone that has been able to reconcile pain with joy. The Unknown spoke this with so fierce a tone, that he silenc'd the Priests, and they suffer'd the Machine to enter, which drew the eyes of the whole Assembly. But indeed a moment after, it was minded no more; because there appear'd a person so infinitely fair, that she attracted the general view. It was known by the livery of the slaves who follow'd her that she was the Wife of him that was in the Machine. She was young, admirably fair, and of a good stature; her name was Lyriana, she was of very noble Birth, and Fortune having been adverse to her Parents, she was in her infancy led by them into the remotest parts of Libya; from whence she return'd so fair and charming, that scarce any could be compar'd to her without doing her injury. Lyriana was tall and well proportion'd, but of that tallness which does not affright, but only adds to the grace of the person. She had a very clear and smooth Complexion, her hair was of a bright and agreeable chestnut, her Nose was well shap'd, and her Mouth well cut, she had a Noble, sweet, sprightly, and Majestical air; and to render her beauty more perfect and charming, she had the handsomest Eyes in the world, for they were black, sparkling, sweet, passionate, and full of spirit; their brightness had something I know not what, which cannot be express'd; a sweet melancholy sometimes appear'd in them amongst all her charms, yet mirth was visible in them at times, with all the attractives which joy can inspire. As for her mind, it seem'd made correspondent to her beauty; she spoke with a good grace naturally, and without affectation. Yet her beauty though transcendent, made her not vain and proud: but joyning the charms of her vertue to those of her beauty and Wit, it might be said she deserv'd all the admiration which was had of her when she enter'd into the Temple of Fortune. Amilcar was charm'd as soon as he beheld her, carefully inquir'd of those next him the name of this fair person, who was so advantageously spoken of to him. As for him that has married her (added he) I ask no news of him, for I do not doubt but he in the Machine is the famous Scarnus, who from a very goodly person in his youth, has been so chang'd by sicknesses that he cannot be known for the same man, and who by the pleasantness of his humor and the firmness of his mind makes health to himself in spite of Nature, and preserves a joy which has render'd him capable of writing a thousand sprightly and divertising Composures, which serve for the pleasure of the illustrious Cleonymus and all accomplish'd persons; and lastly, whose conversation is sought by a great number of Honorable people who frequent his house. 'Tis the very same (answer'd one of those Amilcar was talking to) he lives at Clusium, where all illustrious Strangers go to visit him, as well as all the Persons of Quality of that Court. But, which is remarkable, he is never at a loss for subjects to divert himself and others. And whether he commends or blames, he always does it pleasantly, and with as much facility as wit. He confirms what you say of his merry humor (reply'd Amilcar) by coming in his Machine into the Temple of Fortune: but to speak truth, I am very desirous to know what he will consult the Lots about. After this Amilcar beheld the slaves who carried the Machine, set it down before the Priest who writ the names. And then a slave drawing a curtain which hid Scarnus, it was seen that he did not at all resemble his Picture; and nevertheless, through all the alteration that had befallen him, he seem'd still to have a certain laughing air which promis'd Wit. But, in fine, having caus'd his own name to be writ, and that of the fair Lyriana, he pull'd down his Curtain, and was carried away again in his Machine; for the two hours were just by this time expir'd; so that it behov'd all the multitude to go forth of the Temple, to the end the Answers might be render'd with more secrecy. The names of those which were written being to be drawn at a venture, it hapned that Porfenna's name was drawn first, to consult the Lots; and the order being so, that the explication of the Lot was deliver'd only to such as were concern'd in the business, this explication was deliver'd seal'd to Lucilius after all the Tablets which the child drew and ranked at a venture had been well consider'd.

Next, the names of Berelisa and Clidamira were drawn; and the old Soothsayer who had been present at the conversation of Wishes, and expounded the Lots of Praneste this year, spoke these very words to Clidamira:

You shall be happier by your indifferent humor than any other thing: for being you have never known how to love with steadfastness, therefore you have no reason to expect to be lov'd constantly: but such as determine themselves to none, are always moderately afflicted, and never to be much pited.

Clidamira had some indignation at this Answer, but a moment after her own humor appeas'd her, and caus'd her to say that it was all one to her whether she ow'd her contentment to her indifference or to any thing else. As for Berelisa, the Soothsayer spoke to her after another sort.

I have scarce any thing to speak to you (said he to her) for 'tis easie for you to foresee your destiny: your Constancy is ready to be crown'd, and you are going to reign in one of the most delightful Cities of the world, and in one of the most generous hearts that ever was.

Marry them who love you, though you love not them; and beware of marrying them whom you love, being they do not love you: for according to all appearances, you will at length love those which have lov'd you so long time, and perhaps you will not always love those you do, if they can never love you.

Theanor and Amilius were amaz'd, and seem'd alike dejected at this Answer; and so they retir'd with sufficient sadness, and made way for several others who follow'd them. After which, that famous Lyar (whom Berelisa, Clidamira and Anacreon knew, and whose Lyes had occasion'd a long conversation at Rome amongst divers ingenious persons) presented himself, and ask'd whether it were possible there could be one man in the world who were always veracions. But as if the Gods had been offended, the Sooth-sayer having observ'd the Lots according to custom, answer'd him in these terms:

Rash man, who seekest to excuse thy self with the faults of others, know, that for the punishment of thy continual Lyes, thou shalt not be believ'd even when thou speakest truth. This is all which the Lots of Præneste can answer thee, which will not so dishonour all men, as to make it credible that sincere truth is scarce found upon earth.

Next, Herminius, Amilius and Spurius enquiring of their Destinies, receiv'd such an Answer:

The first-lov'd ought always to be the last-lov'd, unless he have render'd himself unworthy of being so: should it be otherwise, there *would be five persons unhappy, and in the former manner but three. Moreover, it shall come to pass that Amilius shall be satisfied with his own vertue, Spurius cur'd by his anger, and Mutius comforted with his glory.*

This answer caus'd a very sensible joy to Herminius, and much afflicted Amilius and Spurius; and this latter beginning to speak, The Lots of Præneste have given a true decision (said he fiercely) for I begin already to resent such a horrible indignation, that I doubt not but hatred will cure me of my love. Which said, he went away with a very incensed aspect. But Herminius, who always lov'd Amilius, spoke to him with much generosity. You see (said he to him) the will of the Gods cannot be withstood. 'Tis true (answer'd Amilius) and I see too that I must be always miserable; and not being able to find a remedy in hatred as Spurius does, since generosity obliges me not to hate my Rival or my Mistress, I must seek one in death. You will do better (reply'd Herminius) to seek it in the amity of a generous Friend, and in that of a faithful Friend, who is extremely sorry he cannot be happy but by rendring you miserable. Whilst these two Rivals were discoursing in this manner, Meleontus desiring to know whether he should be happy, receiv'd this answer:

Whoso would always have ambition and love together, it is absolutely impossible for him ever to be happy; for it is not in the power of Fortune to content a Lover and an Ambitious man in one single person.

After this the multitude of Strangers which were at Præneste continu'd enquiring what they desir'd to know. But for that Amilcar was not concern'd there longer, after he had congratulated with Herminius for the happy answer he receiv'd, he went to entertain himself with that Lady of Elis whom he had spok'n to the preceding day, and who was walking in a place beset with great Trees before the Temple of Fortune, expecting till she should be call'd to go signify what she desir'd: for the order was, that there should be none in the Temple at that time but they to whom answers were given, all the rest in the mean time attended in that place, whom a young Priest came to the door of the Temple to call according to the order of their names. Wherefore Amilcar addressing to Aretophile, askt her if he might presume to enquire the cause which brought her to Præneste, adding that he believ'd it fit to do in this place as those do who go to the Spaws, who scruple not to pretend maladies however which carri'd them thither. I assure you (said she to him) I never yet had any secret which I could not tell, and it will be easie for me to satisfy you. Know then, that being one at the Valley of Cupids with the Princess Elismonda—Hold, I beseech you (cry'd Amilcar) and let me not pass from the Valley of Cupids without making some stay there. Tell me therefore I conjure you whether this place deserves so fair a name, and whereto it is called so. No doubt it deserves it (answer'd she) but it has not always born this name; for it was sometimes call'd Telisangis; but a great Prince having caus'd a stately Palace to be built there to give to his Mistress, it was from thence call'd the Valley of Cupids; because Love was in effect the occasion that it was built. This circumstance seems so extraordinary (reply'd Amilcar) that I cannot but conjure you to make me the description of a place which seems to have been consecrated to love, and where a second Mother of Cupids is seen; for according to the reports of the Princess Elismonda, she is a person fit to produce such. I will content you (said Aretaphile) though I am not very good at making the description of a handsome place. Know then that the Valley of Cupids is a place of such particular beauty, that it may with truth be said that it has a thousand charms which cannot be found elsewhere. Yet its situation is wild and solitary; but though Nature have not given it the like advantage with places which have prospects of a vast extent, and lie near great Rivers, yet it has a thousand graces which render it an infinitely delightful habitation. This Valley is very fertile, and the place which I am going to describe to you, is perfectly magnificent and agreeable. It is situated upon the brow of a Hill which to make the first Court of this house. The ways which lead to this Palace are admirably fair, for a Royal Forest is to be pass'd through, the great and handsome Walks of which make the goodliest and most solitary Walks in the World; especially in a certain place where the Trees seem to reach up to Heaven, they are handsome, straight, and so thick set with verdant leaves that their shade is infinitely agreeable. As you arrive at the Valley of Cupids you find a very fair fore-court which has a face of rustick edifices on the right hand, and a balustrade on the left, from whence is discover'd an agreeable Valley. From thence you pass into another Court which has the same Balustrade on the left hand and a Walk of Trees on the right. From this place you see the stately front of the Palace which is of a particular structure; the middle advances towards the Court, as well as the two sides of this building, all the Windows whereof are great arches which made a goodly sight; and on the side of the terrass'd Garden, the face of which resembles that of the Court, are seen two Cupids without fillets which seem to consider all the beauties of the prospect. But to return to the Court from whence I have led aside your fancy, I must tell you that you ascend from it by a proud perroon up to a great and magnificent terrace with a Balustrade which runs quite round the Palace, all the apartments of which are stately, and the stair-case which is in the midst of the building is of very great magnificence. There are great Halls pav'd with black and white Marble, very fair Chambers and delightful Cabinets; in one and the same apartment there are convenient places both for heat and cold, conversation and study. For there is a Cabinet from whence is seen not only a pleasant Valley environ'd with little Hills which rather arrest the sight than bound it, but also a great Garden, the squares of which are divided by rivulets which cross one another, so that the midst of the Garden instead of being adorn'd with a Statue, like most others, has a Bridge in it made in fashion of a Cross, which makes the loveliest sight in the World. The rivulet opposite to the building continues between two handsome Groves of equal greatness, which makes an admirable shew. For the Groves being green from the bottom to the top, and reflecting in that amiable rivulet, whose banks are cover'd with grass, there is nothing seen but verdure and water, which renders the place so fit to muse in, that the most indifferent cannot refrain from it. But besides all this, on the right and left side of these two lovely Groves are seen two Meadows surrounded with Brooks and border'd with Willows, which make an admirable object. Beyond which is seen on the right hand a Town among the Trees, and on the left a Village, little Hills of unequal height, other Meadows and a little corner of a plain. But I should be too tedious to you if I should describe to you all the various beauties of this place, and therefore I shall omit them, and tell you that the admirable person which inhabits this rare Desert is become infinitely more amiable and charming than she was when she gave the prizes at the Olympick Games, for she has improv'd in fatness, and has a clearer complexion, and her mind also is more embellish'd; so that 'tis not possible even for the most averse from love to see her now without loving her; and therefore the Prince of Elis who is a person undoubtedly worthy of all sorts of happiness, loves her always very constantly. Ha! Madam (cry'd Amilcar) if I knew as well how to describe to my Mistress the torments which I endure, as you describe the Valley of Cupids, I should be less unhappy than I am. But being I believe you relate all things alike well, tell me I beseech you, what has brought you hither. I will satisfy you (answer'd Aretaphile) Know then I was one day at the Valley of Cupids with some Ladies my Friends, who had a curiosity to see that house; and as such diversions use not to be without the company of some virtuous persons to conduct the Ladies, there were two very accomplished men in ours, though they were not much known to me, but came attending one of the Ladies. You must know also that they lov'd two Virgins which were of this company; but for that they would do like discreet Lovers, they talkt as much to me as to their Mistresses. But I cannot tell you how it came to pass, but I pleas'd them well enough that day. As for this particular (said Amilcar) you may dispense with it, for I see in your eyes wherewith you touch'd their hearts; and if mine were as it us'd to be, and were not resolv'd to be constant, it would be yours already. Since 'tis so (answer'd Aretaphile smiling) I will only tell you that without designing it, I caus'd these two Lovers to prove unfaithful; yet I did not perceive it at that time, but some days after all the Town came and told me two men had forsaken their Mistresses and lov'd me. Wherefore making more narrow observation, I saw it was true, and found my self incumbred at the same time with the love of two men whom I did not affect, and the hatred of two Virgins whom I did not hate. Yet I thought then, that there needed only a little of my severity to return these unfaithful Lovers back again to their Mistresses. But being (as I conceive) they did not forsake them but only because they were two of those good persons whose excessive gentleness cloyes rather than diverts, my severity augmented their Love. Since that, I confess without vanity, I have been lov'd by divers others; But I must acknowledge, never by any man whom I could believe worthy of my love. Yet I confess too that I saw a passenger at Syracusa whom I could love, and whom I judge perfectly worthy to be lov'd. But he has not lov'd me, and never will; for according to all probabilities, we shall never see one another again as long as we live. Ah! Madam (said Amilcar) may I not presume to ask you what manner of person it was whom you could love? I will content you (answer'd she) for I assure you I always take delight in speaking of him. Know then, the illustrious Cleander (so is he call'd that pleases me) is of one of the

the most illustrious families of the Kingdom where he lives, which has maintain'd it self most gloriously in repute, either by the great actions of such as have been descended of it, or by illustrious alliances. He is tall, and of a good proportion, he has also been admirably handsome in his first youth, and at present he has an extraordinary good aspect, and perfectly the air of a man of high Quality, such as he is. And though he has receiv'd a wound with an arrow under his eye in a very dangerous occasion, yet he is very little alter'd by it. He has flaxen hair, blew eyes, the form of his visage is agreeable, and all the lineaments regular enough; he has a certain serious air, accompani'd with a sweetness perfectly noble, which causes a good opinion of him at first sight. His looks are sometimes very passionate when he pleases, and there are handsomer eyes than his which are not so proper for a certain mute language which love alone has the privilege to teach. Moreover, Cleander's very silence is so ingenious, that never any person seem'd so much with speaking so little. And indeed he has a great Wit, which being facile and easie, he complies with the most ignorant and tedious without appearing such himself. So that they who have not a very discerning judgment, would suspect him not able to do much hurt with it. But this facility is an effect of the highest prudence and understanding in the world. He has the most free and civil deportment that ever was, yet his civility does not hinder him from preserving a high and noble way of carriage which renders him more agreeable to others and more worthy of his condition. All his Gestures have a certain gallant air which pleases infinitely, so that having a Soul by Nature perfectly passionate, he is very apt both to be sensible of and to excite great passions; for he knows all the violence, delicacy, and Mystery of Loves better than Vulgar Lovers. But to pass from agreeable to Heroical Qualities, he is Honorable, sincere, generous, and as good a friend as is possible to be; and whoso has oblig'd him to promise his friendship, may be assur'd he will never fail in it. Moreover, his heart is fill'd with the most true and solid glory in the World. So that in occasions where it is to be obtain'd, or that which he has already gotten is to be upheld, this man whom I have represented to you so gentle, so facile, and so complacent, is the most fierce and resolute in the World. As for his courage, he has as much as any man; so that this being joyn'd to his wit and other accomplishments, makes it apparent that there is no employment how great soever of which he is not capable and worthy; and he gives cause to believe that if there be any man in the world who would not alter his deportment towards his Friends in an extraordinary advancement of fortune, it is certainly himself. His conversation is not only agreeable, but charming; for he enters into the sentiments of those to whom he speaks without any affectation, and conforms thereto with address; by which means he insensibly insinuates into the hearts of people; and such a person as sometimes believ'd he was only an acquaintance, has found soon after that he had a great interest in his affection. He is courteous even in the least concerns, and his gentleness, pity, and gratitude extend even to the smallest Animals. For he loves to observe their natures, goodness, and agreeableness, and industry; he admires that rational instinct which guides them so accurately, he is delighted with their kindness, he has compassion of those that are miserable; because whatever suffers, excites his pity. He is alike fit for the conversation of Ladies and men, and he writes so admirably well, and in so elegant and gallant a strain, and so much becoming a man of Quality, that his Letters cause such as see them to wish they could write the like. In fine, his merit is so great that the charming Clarissa niece of the admirable Amalthea (whose name you cannot but know) minding to use railery with him and to disparage his conversation, could only reproach him that he sometimes lov'd to recount things past rather than to speak of things present. Thus I have given you such an account as I could of this illustrious Friend of Amalthea, whom I could have lov'd, if he had lov'd me. However, having affairs in Sicily, and a brother who after several adventures is come to live at Praneste, I took a journey to see him, and I am resolv'd to demand, Whether I shall never be lov'd but by people whom I cannot love. Aretaphile spoke this so gracefully, that if at the same moment one had not call'd her to go know what she desir'd to understand, Amilcar could scarce have contain'd from speaking some kind of blandishments to her, though he had resolv'd to love Plotina eternally. But Aretaphile left him and went to inquire her Destiny of him who perform'd the Ceremony and expounded the Lots, who said to her,

Thank the Gods, Daughter; for if you were lov'd by one whom you could love, you would be the most miserable person in the World; because you would always love more than you would be lov'd again. Therefore prepare your self to love nothing but liberty if you desire to be happy.

Anacreon was call'd next, and askt Fortune whether he should live always in joy. The Soothsayer having consider'd the several Tablets, answer'd him. And accordingly the event verifi'd the prediction of the Lots, for Anacreon dy'd afterward at a Feast, where he was choak'd by the grain of a Grape. After Anacreon, Scarnus was caus'd to enter with his Machine, who with an air serious and mocking together, askt if there were any means for him to become such a person as his Picture, and to resemble his Picture once again. Being the Priests were oblig'd to answer to all Questions, the Lots were drawn, and the old Soothsayer interpreting them, answer'd him in these terms:

You know not what you ask when you desire to become again what you have been. Which if you were, you would be young and handsome, you would dance well, you would be an excellent Painter, you would be active and agreeable, but withal, you would be nothing but a Gallant waton, who had only made Sonnets upon Iris or Clymene, and your Reputation would be circumscrib'd in the number of your Friends. But by the change hapned in your person, your mind being excited to make amends for the loss of your beauty, is become such as you now enjoy, and has now so exalted you above the common sort of men, that you are the Phoenix of your Species. Your Works please the whole World by their ingenious mirth and elegancy. Desire therefore only to be such as you are, and be contented that the Gods in giving you Lyriana have given you a thousand times more than they have taken from you, even though you had been more amiable than Paris.

After this Scaurus retir'd, saying, the Lots of Præneste taught him nothing, and he knew before all that they told him. Then the fair Lyriana was call'd, who would propound no Question though her name was written. For having well consider'd (said she to the Priest) If it be decreed for me to be happy, I shall be so infallibly; and if any infelicity is to befall me, I will not know it before it happen. What you say is so well reason'd (answer'd the sage Soothsayer) that I doubt not but you will always be as happy as you deserve to be. Next came Amilcar's turn, who demanded, whether he should dye in Africk or in Italy; and the Soothsayer answer'd him,

In Italy.

Whereupon he was very joyful, imagining that the voyage which he design'd to make into Africk would not be long. After this, Acrisius asks whether he should ever possess Plotina: and the Soothsayer having consider'd the Tablets, told him,

Such as speak too much, never persuade.

Then Damon the constant Pythagorean propos'd two questions. One, whether his Mistress would always slight him; and the other, what he should become first of all when he dy'd. But after the Child had drawn the Tablets, the Soothsayer expounded them in this sort.

Your Mistress will always do you justice; you shall dye but once, and you shall be as all other men are when they depart this life; for the Disciples of Pythagoras have no particular privilege.

Damon seem'd so offended with this answer, that he said aloud as he went forth of the Temple, Amilcar had brib'd the Soothsayer, and the Lots of Præneste were nothing but a cheat. Amilcar laugh'd at his choler, and made pleasant railery upon the discontent which Damon resent'd, for that it was told him he should dye but once. Yet he went to supper with Damon, who invit'd him, for he was so scrupulous an observer of all the Documents of Pythagoras, that he would not go to bed with a sentiment of hatred in his heart towards his Rival; at least he profess'd so. Herminius, Anacreon, Theonor, and Emilius were present at this entertainment. Amilcar was very jovial this evening; yet now and then he seem'd a little pensive. An hour after the repast, he began to be indispos'd, but in so violent a manner that he dy'd the next day, but with admirable constancy, sending commendations to all his Friends, and particularly to Plotina. He encharg'd Herminius with many generous expressions to all those he had lov'd, and a thousand dear commendations unto his Mistress. And thus dy'd the agreeable Amilcar, regretted by all who had known him. Herminius, and a Lady that was his Friend, and another Person of Quality undertook to gather together all the ingenious Compositions which he had written; and some time after he erected a monument for him, whereon was engrav'd an Epitaph made upon this Illustrious Deceased, by a Lady who was Friend to Amilcar and Herminius.

EPITAPH.

*This Tomb the fam'd Amilcar doth enshrine,
Who to a sprightly Genius Art did joyn;
Whose lofty Soul to unfathom'd heights could fly,
Yet fall as low as complacence can lie.
But what's most strange, he that rare talent got To please, he pleas'd even those who lov'd him not.*

All such as had only seen him at the Temple of Fortune, regretted him with a sensible sorrow. Anacreon lamented him (though he did not think himself capable of grief) and profess'd he never knew a more agreeable Wit in any place of the World. Acrisius too (as much his Rival as he was) seem'd mov'd with his loss. But as for Damon, he was so unhappy as to be suspected of having caus'd him to be poyson'd. But however, Amilcar dy'd and confirm'd the credit of the Lots of Præneste, which told him he should not dye in Africk, and which he constru'd to his own advantage. Yet it was but a bare suspicion: for the Friends of Amilcar did not judge fit rashly to search into such a business as this, which should it have been true, would have nothing profited the illustrious Deceased. But whilst things pass'd thus at Præneste, and Amilcar and Lucilius were expecting to see whether he that desir'd to consult his fortune in private were Mutius or no, Aronces was very unhappy in his prison, and in a desperate condition; Sextus was much discontented for having fail'd of his design to carry Clelia away, and studi'd only to find ways for a second attempt; Tullia was contriving to destroy Aronces and Clelia, Tarquin only to find means to recover his Throne, Galeria and the Princess of the Leontines how to serve Aronces and Clelia, Artemidorus thought only of his happiness and to protect Aronces, Zenocratus of nothing but his jealousy, Themistus of returning as soon as Aronces should be out of danger, Publicola of assuring the Peace, and Horatius of his love. In the mean time the prudent Roman who went to conduct the twenty fair Roman Ladies to Porfenna, being on the way to the Camp, saw himself attack'd by Sextus, who with a hundred Horse attempted a second time to carry away Clelia. The convoy of these fair Virgins consisted of fifty men, so that the number was very unequal. Besides, he who commanded them being an old man could not encourage his Party by his own example with the same ardour as Sextus did, whose courage too was augmented by his love. Yet this Prince was disguis'd, for the enterprize was made with Tullia's consent, who in giving satisfaction to Sextus intended to persuade Porfenna that the Friends of Aronces had convey'd away this fair Lady for fear she should bear witness against Aronces; and consequently by this artifice to hasten the ruine of this great Prince. And indeed Sextus had the success he desir'd at first; for whilst those fifty Romans were fighting against his men, he caus'd him to be slain who drove the Chariot in which Clelia, Valeria, Hermilia, and Plotina were, and then ordering a man design'd for that purpose to take his place, he made the Chariot be driven into the way leading to Tarquinius, himself with twenty others guarding it, whilst the rest of his followers detain'd the Romans in fight to amuse them. And this design succeeded accordingly; for the Romans seeing the whole body of Chariots stop, did not miss that in which Clelia was. Sextus now believing nothing nothing could obstruct his happiness, Clelia, Valeria, Plotina, and Hermilia were forc'd to cry out; but their cries were not heard. But though Sextus was sufficiently disguis'd, yet Clelia did not doubt but that it was he who carri'd her away. Wherefore courageously resolving upon death, she only devis'd how to effect it, so to prevent all the unhappinesses which she had cause to fear. On the other side the fight was sufficiently sharp in the place where the rest of the Roman Ladies were, who were so terrifi'd that they did not perceive Clelia was carri'd away. In the mean time the wife Roman who conducted the Hostages having sent to Rome to desire succour, it hapned that he who was sent thither met Horatius standing at the Gate with Octavius. Who being advertis'd of the business sent to give notice of it to the Consuls; but themselves not waiting for the succour which they presum'd would be sent, immediately took Horse and speeded to the place where the fight was. But as they were going thither, they beheld upon a little hill the Chariot in which Clelia was guarded by Sextus, who was by this time a good distance off. Wherefore imagining that this might be the Chariot that carried the Persons they lov'd, they went first to the Chariots which were stop'd, where not finding what they sought, they hastned to the place of the fight; but in stead of staying there, I beseech you (said Horatius to four or five Romans who were nearest him) come help us to deliver the Daughters of Clelius, she of Publicola, and the sister of Brutus out of the hands of their Ravishers. At these words these Romans without delay follow'd Horatius and Octavius, and left their Companions sufficiently employ'd in sustaining the charge of the Tarquinius. But though Horatius, Octavius, with these five Romans rid with full speed, they could not have overtaken Sextus if it had not by good hap fell out that in the haste this violent Prince made his Party to march, they mistook one way for another. So that being engag'd in a place where great Trees had been by chance beat down, which obstructed the passage, he was necessitated to return back again and come towards them who pursu'd him. Nevertheless, when he saw they were few in number, he was not much dejected, but leaving four of his men to guard the Chariot, he came up to them which pursu'd him with a resolution which his confidence in the inequality of number made something Heroical. Clelia and her companions lookt out with great grief and small hope upon those who came to succour them. But their sentiments were very confus'd, when they knew Horatius and Octavius; for in what danger soever Clelia was, death would have been sweeter to her than to have an obligation to Horatius; and on the other side, seeing her Brother in so eminent a jeopardy, she could not but resent great inquietude. Hermilia (as indifferent as she was to all things) was troubled at it; and Valeria and Plotina without much deliberating, made Vows for their Protectors. Horatius beholding Sextus disguis'd, did not doubt but it was he who was the Ringleader of the enterprise. Wherefore approaching him with his sword drawn, Who are you? (cry'd he) I am come to punish you for your villany. And with these words he made such a pass upon him, that if he had not avoided it by retiring back, he had been slain by the first blow. But immediately this valiant Roman saw himself engag'd in the midst of half Sextus's party, whilst Octavius encountred the rest with incredible Valour. It was not long before two of those who

follow'd Horatius and Octavius were slain, so that there were but five left against a number three times as great. 'Tis true, Horatius kill'd two, and Octavius wounded three of them; but one of Sextus's followers who aim'd only to make his Master victor by what way soever it were, endeavour'd chiefly to kill or at least to wound the horses of Horatius and Octavius. So that in a little time these two courageous persons not doubting such a baseness, and minding only the assailing of their enemies and their own defence, perceiv'd that their horses fail'd them, and saw themselves dismounted and consequently in great danger, especially Horatius, whose sword was broken by the fall of his horse. However, in this condition he did prodigious things; and Octavius having disentangled himself disputed both his life and his liberty. But fifteen or sixteen horsemen against two on foot being a number too unequal (for the three others who remain'd fled, when they saw them fall) they were at length over-power'd. Yet they were wounded but very slightly; but the sword of Horatius being broken off at the hilt, he was taken prisoner by Sextus. So that Octavius being now all alone, was no longer able to resist the force of the enemies, but was disarm'd and taken as well as Horatius. Sextus being over-joy'd with his victory took his Vizard off his face, and shew'd himself to them he had overcome, as it were insulting the more over their misfortune. Ah, Villain! (cri'd Horatius when he knew him) is it possible that I am overcome by thee! However, do not hope to enjoy thy Victory (added he) the Gods are too just; and these stones shall sooner be chang'd into Soldiers than heaven will permit thee to be master of the destiny of Horatius and so many vertuous persons. Sextus smil'd at this speech of Horatius without answering to it, and inhumanely caus'd this generous Heroe to be ty'd behind one of his men, treating Octavius a little better because he was Clelia's brother: after which he began to proceed on his way.

The grief of Clelia and her companions was now so vehement, that they were not able to complain; but Sextus had scarce time to think that he was going to have the joy to put Horatius into the power of Tarquinius and Tullia, that he had Clelia in his hands, and that this carrying her away would hasten the death of Aronces, but he beheld this Prince at the entrance of a little Wood through which he was to pass, and beheld him in the head of ten men of quality, amongst which was Tellanus, Plotina's Lover. This sight so surpriz'd him, that he caus'd his men to make a halt. On the other side when Horatius (who was extremely dejected for having been overcome in the sight of Clelia) saw Aronces; he was strangely abash'd to be seen in this condition, by a Rival whom he was so jealous of. Nevertheless a sentiment of love caus'd him to wish that he might deliver Clelia; but the same love at the same time caus'd him to desire death, as imagining nothing could be more advantageous to him. Clelia (who believ'd Aronces in prison) was much surpriz'd to see him; and tearing he might have the same destiny with Horatius, she had such confus'd sentiments that she could not tell what to hope or wish. As for Aronces, he was not astonish'd to meet Sextus or see Clelia; for he had broke prison only to deliver her, upon notice given him by one of his Guards that Sextus design'd to carry her away when the Senate sent her back to the Camp. But he was strangely surpriz'd to see Horatius prisoner to Sextus. After this great and generous Heroe had beheld Clelia at a good distance, as if to receive addition to his valour by a favourable glance, he went up to those who guarded Horatius as he was bound; (for Sextus retir'd from the first rank to give orders to his men) and fiercely accosting them, Ha, traitors! (said he to them) do you thus treat the bravest man in the world? In speaking which, he kill'd one of them, and wounded two; and then causing his Rival to be unbound, commanded his Squire to give him a sword and a horse, which was led in hand; and speaking to him, Come, Horatius (said he) come help me to deliver Clelia; for since I see Porfenna has resolv'd upon my death, I know none but your self in the world (when I am dead) worthy to serve her, and capable to defend her. Ha! Aronces (cri'd Horatius) 'tis worse to be deliver'd by you than to be overcome by Sextus. After which Aronces espying Octavius, let him also at liberty in spite of the resistance of Sextus, who being return'd from his astonishment, and having given orders to his men, fought like a desperate Tyger. But Aronces being animated by the love he had for Clelia, the hatred he had for Sextus, the esteem he had for Horatius, and the desire to surpass him, perform'd such prodigious things in this occasion, that Horatius and Octavius were astonish'd, though they were two of the most courageous men in the world. Yet they seconded him as vigorously as they could; but being they were both wounded sufficiently with the former fall of their horses, they were not able to shew all their courage: for Horatius right arm was half out of joint, and Octavius was so wounded in the knee that he could scarce keep himself steadfast upon his horse. So that Aronces almost alone sustain'd the brunt of this sharp fight. Telanus also highly signaliz'd himself. But this Combat became yet more dangerous to Aronces; for they who had stay'd behind fighting with the Romans to amuse them, believing Sextus was got at a good distance, retreated and follow'd him; and when they beheld Sextus engag'd with Aronces, they joyn'd with him. But for that the Romans had slain some, and some had given over the encounter, this re-enforcement (though very considerable) rather augmented Aronces courage, who judging that to defeat his enemies at a blow it was requisite to kill Sextus, he open'd his way to him by killing such of his men as would have withstood him; and then there began a furious Combat between these two Rivals. Aronces at first wounded Sextus, who discharging a great blow at him, might perhaps have slain or dangerously wounded him, if he had not warded it off with addresses, and if without losing time he had not discharg'd another at him upon the head, which was so weighty that it amaz'd him. In the mean time all Sextus's men taking care only to defend him, Aronces was continually assail'd by many together; but he so well quitted himself of so many enemies, and kill'd so many, that being seconded by Horatius, Octavius, Telanus, and all the rest who had follow'd him, Sextus perceiv'd he had not many more men than Aronces; wherefore feeling himself wounded, despairing to overcome, and much fearing to fall into the power of Porfenna or the Romans after this action of his, he resolv'd upon flight, knowing that he had a very swift horse. And accordingly beginning to give ground as he fought, on a sudden he turn'd about and fled with all his men after him into the Wood and by-ways which were known to himself but not to Aronces. Who having lost sight of him was recall'd by love from the pursuit to Clelia notwithstanding the ardent desire he had to kill Sextus. But for that Horatius knew this wood better than Aronces, he took a way into it, being follow'd by Octavius and Telanus, and hoping to intercept Sextus by a short turn; during which Aronces going directly to Clelia's Chariot, was receiv'd with a thousand testimonies of kindness by her and her companions, who gave him a thousand praises. That which I have done, Madam (said he to Clelia) is so small a matter, that it is not fit to lose the moments which are precious to us in commending me more than I deserve. Therefore it is requisite that I conduct you to Rome, and after that go and satisfy the King my Father that I have not broke my prison as a parricide who would avoid the punishment he deserves, but as an unfortunate and faithful Lover, who would defend the person he adores. How? my Lord (answer'd Clelia) are you come forth of prison only to succour me? and may I believe you are constant to me? I beseech you (added she) tell me what course you took to do it. I was advertis'd by a trusty soldier of my guards (repl'd he) that Sextus design'd to carry you away. Whereupon I brib'd some, broke through the rest, and having found Telanus and a Squire, they in a moment got together these which follow'd me, and I came happily enough to do you perhaps the last service of my life; for as I told you, Madam, it behoves me to return to prison, as soon as I have conducted you to Rome. Ah! my Lord (answer'd Clelia) this generosity is extreme cruel; but to imitate you in some sort, do not carry me back to Rome, but lead me to the Camp, to the end I may serve to justify you. No, no Madam (said he to her) it does not belong to me to return the Hostages to the King, to whom perhaps they would no longer be inviolable. Therefore 'tis absolutely necessary that I conduct you to Rome, from whence the Consuls will remit you hither if they please: but if you will take my counsel, Madam, do not return hither though it should be resolv'd to remand you; and all the favour I desire of you, if I die, is, that you would believe that I have never lov'd any but your self, that I have lov'd you more than any other person in the world can love, and that I shall regret you alone at my death.

As Aronces was speaking this, Horatius, Octavius and Telanus came to them, without having found Sextus. After which taking the way towards Rome, they met those the Consuls sent to the succour of the Hostages coming to seek Clelia and her companions. Aronces understood by them that the rest of the fair Romans were carri'd back into the City till it were known what this adventure was, and who had committed this violent and unjust attempt. However he would conduct Clelia till within two hundred paces of Rome. Upon the way there was a discourse between Horatius and him which was not heard by any other person, and wherein it appear'd both of them constrain'd themselves and that Horatius was much dejected for owing his life so often to his Rival: but at length Aronces being oblig'd to depart, he took leave of Clelia and her companions, after a manner which mov'd the hearts of all that beheld it; for there appear'd an heroic resolution in his countenance, though his eyes withal discover'd an extreme sadness, which manifestly proceeded from love. As for Clelia, never was seen so sad a person as she in this occasion; but her melancholy was accompani'd with so much discretion, that it caus'd the greater compassion. Plotina desir'd Telanus to dissuade Aronces from returning into prison; but he answer'd her, that the Prince was too great a Lover of glory, to leave himself under the suspicion of being culpable.

culpable. Aronces and Horatius parted with civility, Remember (said the Prince of Hetruria to him) what you have promis'd me, I will not fail (answer'd Horatius) but do you remember also that in some occasions one may be excusable in being ingrateful. Aronces embrac'd Octavius with much dearness, and having once again bid Clelia adieu with the most passionate air in the World, he took the way to the Camp, where all things were in strange confusion. For Porfenna understanding Aronces had broke prison, became absolutely confirm'd in his opinion that he was culpable, and had conspir'd against his life. Wherefore out of this prejudice, he said there needed no other proofs, and commanded some to pursue and bring him back, that he might cause him to be punish'd as a parricide, there being no necessity of more evidence. Moreover, that wife Roman who was encharged with the conduct of the Hostages, having sent to advertise him that he could not bring them to the Camp that day, because Clelia was carry'd away, he believ'd Aronces was he that had done it; so that assembling all his conjectures together, he fram'd an immutable purpose in his mind to destroy both Aronces and Clelia if he could get them into his power. Neither Galerita nor the Princess of the Leontines, nor any of Aronces friends could make any thing appear probable to him contrary to these two surmises; for they knew nothing of the truth. So there was an universal consternation in the minds of all; for the flight of Aronces caus'd a very bad effect amongst the Soldiers who were most affectionate to him.

On the other side Tarquin and Tullia were in their quarter impatiently expecting what would happen from the correspondence they had in Rome, the carrying away of Clelia, Porfenna's accusation of Aronces, and the design of bribing him who expounded the Lots of Præneste; and in whatever cases, their forces had order to be ready to march, if it were requisite.

But if there were a tumult in the Camp, there was a greater at Rome; for some said, the Hostages ought not to be return'd more, because it was probable Porfenna knew of Sextus attempt, and that certainly he would have had Clelia in his power without appearing to have broken the publick faith. Publicola nevertheless persisted still firm in his opinion, and so much the more, because Horatius and Octavius could not go abroad this day by reason of their wounds; for perhaps love would have oblig'd them to oppose it. On the other side, Clelia, with the consent of her companions demanded that they might return to Porfenna, to the end to accuse Sextus and justifie Aronces as much as she could; for her jealousy was now much diminish'd. At the same time, also the intelligence which Tarquin and Tullia had in Rome was discover'd, and one was seiz'd on who had promis'd to deliver the gate Nevia to the Tarquinians. So that all this together caus'd so great a disorder in the City, that the Senate was assembled extraordinarily, to advise what was fitting to be done. The result of their debate was, to send back the Hostages with a strong guard, to acquaint Porfenna with Sextus enterprise to carry away Clelia, and that of Tarquin upon Rome after a treaty of peace.

But whilst all was in confusion both at Rome and the Camp, and the infamous and criminal Sextus was retir'd to Tarquinia wounded and desperate for having fail'd of his attempt, the generous Aronces overwhelm'd with discontents was going to re-enter into his prison. Upon the way he met some of those who made shew of going to seek him and take him, but they sought him only to advertise him of Porfenna's fury; but whatever they could say to him, he would not alter his purpose; he also desir'd Telannus to leave him, for fear he might incur Porfenna's displeasure; but Telannus would not. When he came to the Camp, he went directly to his Prison, and finding no guards there he sent Telannus to the King his Father to desire them again, and to conjure him to permit him to see him, to the end to give an account of his action. But Porfenna was so incens'd, that instead of bearing Telannus, he caus'd him to be arrested and carried to the same prison where Aronces was, whither also he speedily dispatcht guards; for in his fury, he believ'd the Prince his Son return'd only because he saw he could not escape apprehending; or that perhaps he had oblig'd some of those whom he sent after him, to say he return'd of his own accord. So that he was fully resolv'd to punish Aronces.

The next day Galerita follow'd by the Princess of the Leontines, the charming Herfilia, and the generous Melintha enter'd into his Tent to intercede with him for Aronces. But before the Queen of Hetruria could speak any thing to him, word was brought to the King that the Romans had sent the Hostages back. Whereupon being surpris'd to see that after what had hapned, these twenty fair Virgins were remanded to him, he seem'd sufficiently perplex'd, though he wish'd to have Clelia in his power, to the end to make use of her to convince Aronces.

The Senate (said he roughly) relies much upon the Publick Faith, in sending back to me a person who has at least been privy to a conspiracy made against my life. Ah my Lord (cry'd Galerita) the prince most assuredly is not culpable. You shall see that, Madam (said he to her) you shall see that. In the mean time (added he with a grim air) let the Hostages be brought hither. This Order being given, the Roman who conducted them, and who was nam'd Celius, enter'd in the head of these twenty fair Romans. But because entrance was not prohibited, the Prince Artemidorus, Themistius, Theomenes, Zenocrates, divers Officers, and many others enter'd at the same time. The sight of these fair Virgins whom he would not see when they were in his Camp, surpris'd Porfenna. They enter'd with a good grace, they saluted him with a civility perfectly noble, and carrying a modest confidence in their countenances, they forc'd him to behold them less fiercely than he would. Yet he strove against this first sentiment which he could not restrain, and recalling his fury, Which of you (said he to them, without hearing Celius who was beginning to speak) was so rash as to contrive that unjust design of violating the Law of Nations, by departing out of my power without my permission, and rather to endanger perishing in the Tyber than stay in the Camp? That generous design (answer'd Valeria readily, being unwilling all Porfenna's choler should fall upon Clelia) is so glorious, that all my Companions and my self will have part in it. No, no, too generous Friend (said Clelia beholding Valeria) it is not fit that you should unjustly expose your self to the indignation of a great King. Therefore, my Lord (added she, addressing to Porfenna) understand the truth from my mouth, and know, that that glorious design belongs to me alone, and I us'd all means I could to perswade my Companions to it, who knowing the just ground I had to undertake it, were so generous as to hazard their own lives for the preservation of my honour. You ought rather to say (reply'd Porfenna) that the fear of being compel'd

by force to accuse a Criminal whom you love, oblig'd you to fly. Ah! my Lord (answer'd Clelia, without being daunted or transported) did I believe the Prince your son capable of so horrid a Crime as that you accuse him of, I should hate rather than love him; for my parents have taught me to hate vice, even upon the Throne. But, my Lord, I went out of your Camp for no other cause but for that I was advertis'd Sextus design'd to carry me away. So that believing nothing ought to be so dear to me as the preservation of my honour, I slighted death which seem'd so assur'd, and attempted to pass the Tyber. But to confirm that which I speak, you need only admit the trouble to hear what Celins has order to say to you from the Senate. Clelia spoke this with so noble an air, that Porfenna was astonish'd at her great Beauty, Wit and Confidence. Wherefore fearing his heart might become inclinable to pity, if she spoke more, he commanded Celins to discharge his Commission. My Lord (said this wife Roman) I have order from the Senate to render the Hostages to your Majesty, and to tell you that whilst Rome keeps her word so exactly, those whom you protect against her, outrage you with all the injustice imaginable. For Sextus yesterday attempted to have carri'd away Clelia, and with a hundred Horse attack'd those that guarded her under my command. At first he appear'd disguis'd, but afterwards he made himself known. Horatius came to succour this virtuous Lady and three of her Companions whom he had got into his power; but the valour of Horatius and Octavius Clelia's Brother was forc'd to give way to number, so that they were taken prisoners; and if the valiant and generous Aronces had not arriv'd to their relief, Clelia, Horatius and Octavius would have continued under the power of that unjust Prince. But to let you see that he is not the sole person of the Tarquins who outrages you, there is discover'd a Conspiracy of Tarquin and Tullia in Rome, the principal Plotters of which we have in custody, whom the Senate is willing to refer to your justice. All which you say (answer'd Porfenna) surprises and confounds me; but should all which you say, be true, it would not justify Aronces; and if Clelia would declare the truth she might accuse and convict him. If he were culpable (answer'd Clelia) and his crime were come to my knowledge, I would not accuse him, though I saw certain death before me. But, my Lord, my hatred would accuse him, and I should so abhor him, that all I could do would be to forbear hurting him. However, my Lord, suffer me to tell you for your own honour, that the Prince cannot be culpable, and you cannot without injustice treat him as a criminal. I know well (added she) that you hate him because he does me the honour to love me; but, my Lord, this hatred is unjust (if I may presume to speak so.) I knew not that he was the Son of a King when he began to love me, nor did he know it himself; and since we have known it, I never led him to disobey you. No doubt he has not been able to cease to love me, nor I to take away an affection from him which I gave him by the command of my Father. But, my Lord, fear nothing from this innocent passion, and be assur'd it can never induce to Criminal actions. I am not indeed Daughter of a King; but, my Lord, I am a Roman, and daughter of a Roman who prefers virtue above all things. Beware therefore, I conjure you, to blemish your glory by an injustice. I do not ask of you to reign in Hetruria (continu'd she) I only desire you would please to give the Prince time to justify himself. I have been accusom'd to misfortunes, I shall know how to live as I have done; and if the Gods shall so please, I shall know how to die too with sufficient courage. Porfenna beheld Clelia attentively whilst she was speaking, and being unable to hinder himself from admiring her, Would to the Gods (cry'd this offended Prince) you could have as well perswaded me of the innocence of Aronces as of your own. For I confess (added he) I find something of such grandeur in what I have now heard, and in what you have done, that to imitate the generosity of the Romans, I will send you back again to Rome, and oblige you to ask some reward of me for the daring action you have done; for, excepting the life and liberty of Aronces, I promise you whatever you shall demand of me. Since 'tis so, my Lord (answer'd she) I desire only the favour of you, that you will take time to examine well the virtue of the Prince, and the wickedness of Tullia, and that you will send back all the Hostages as well as my self. I grant you that which you demand of me (reply'd Porfenna) and if my Son were worthy of you, nothing could hinder you from being one day Queen of Hetruria; so charm'd I am with your courage and virtue. After this, Porfenna spoke many things to Celins, that he might understand more clearly the enterprise of Tarquin and Tullia against Rome. Which done, he caus'd the goodliest Horse he had to be given to Clelia, to testify that he judg'd she had the courage of a Heroe; for it was a custome of the Kings of Hetruria to make the like present to such as had signaliz'd themselves by some heroical action.

But after these fair Romans were departed, Lucilius, Herminius, Theanor, Emilius the old Soothsayer who expounded the Lots at Præneste, and Celer (who had been prisoner so long at Tarquinius) arriv'd. As soon as they came into the Tent, Mutius approach'd, and addressing to the King of Hetruria and shewing him the hand which he had so courageously suffer'd to burn in his presence, Is it possible my Lord (said he to him) that a man whom you saw so stout as to endure the fire unmov'd in your presence, should be the complice of a Parricide? No, no, my Lord (added he) true Romans are not capable of committing such crimes as that. I would have destroy'd you for the good of my Country, but I should never have done it to promote your Son to the Throne. Be pleas'd therefore to command those who pretend I treated with them by Aronces order, to be brought into my sight, to the end I may cover them with confusion; and if it be needful I will put my hand a second time into the fire without fearing to be burnt, to attest this truth. Moreover, let not my departure from Rome be interpreted flight, my particular unhappineses caus'd me to go to Præneste, there to consult the Gods secretly; and though they have not been favourable to me, and I had resolv'd to go hide my discontent in some remote place from Rome; yet I no sooner heard by Herminius that the Prince your Son was accus'd and my self too, but I came hither for his justification and my own; and if you please to hear Celer who has escap'd out of the prison of Tarquinius where Tullia kept him, he will inform you of sundry things more which justify Aronces. And what can you inform me of? said (Porfenna hastily to Celer.) My Lord, I shall inform you (answer'd he) that they which depose against the Prince were prisoners with me, and to obtain their liberty, promis'd Tullia to bear that false witness. They told me so themselves when they endeavor'd to persuade me on the behalf of Tullia, to help to destroy Aronces; and I was sometimes threaten'd with death, and sometimes promis'd my liberty, to bring me to what they desir'd; and if they were present, I assure my self they would not dare to contradict me. But, my Lord, if this sage Soothsayer whose honesty you know, speak to you, he will tell you things more important. 'Tis true, my Lord (said the Soothsayer who had dwelt long at Clusnum) that Tullia sent a man to me at Praneste on the day of the great Festival of Fortune, to offer me considerable rewards if I would betray the Gods, and render a false answer to Lucilius, who came to consult them on your behalf. But being I am incapable of committing an impiety, I deliver'd it seal'd up to Lucilius, as it was found in the Lots of the most redoubtable of all the Deities. And to make good what I alledge against Tullia, I have caus'd him to be arrested who would have suborn'd my fidelity. Lucilius, Herminius, Emilius, Theonor, and Mutius, having confirm'd that which this sage Soothsayer said, Porfenna took the seal'd-up answer which Lucilius brought him, and having open'd it with a countenance which manifested the agitation of his mind, he found these words.

Thy son is innocent; thou canst not destroy him without thy own destruction; his love is well-pleasing to the Gods; and if thou hinderest him from being happy, thou shalt always be unfortunate.

Porfenna was much mov'd at this answer, but would not express it yet; and commanded some persons to go forthwith to the Quarters of Tullia to require those men of her who were to maintain before Mutius that Aronces was a partaker in his design to kill him. But he had scarce given this Order, when word was brought him that Tarquin and Tullia were discamp'd, and had set men at work to break the bridge, which serv'd for the communication of the Quarters, to the end they might not be follow'd so speedily; because though Porfenna had another, yet it was very remote from the road to Tarquiniæ. And to compleat the discovery of all these wickednesses, two men were brought to him whom Tullia had commanded to be first stab'd, and then cast into the Tyber. But being she had been but ill-obey'd in the tumult caus'd by sudden discamping, and they to whom the order was given pity'd them, they were permitted to fly whither they could. But not knowing whither to fly either towards Rome or the Camp, the remorse of their Crimes brought them to seek their safety in the clemency of Porfenna. And so causing themselves to be presented to him, they cast themselves at his feet, lay'd open the accursed contrivance of Tullia, and implor'd his pity to pardon two unhappy persons, who to avoid perpetual imprisonment had promis'd to commit a crime.

Aronces being now fully justifi'd, Porfenna was so confounded for his own injustice, that he commanded some to go and fetch the Prince immediately. Who accordingly coming, follow'd by Tellus and a great number of Officers, Porfenna went to him as soon as he saw him, and embracing him with tenderness, The Gods and men have justifi'd you (said he to him) and 'tis I at present who am the Criminal. But, my Son, I will shortly make you satisfaction, and I have so ill us'd my Authority that I will resign it into your hands. In the mean time, go forthwith in the head of the Cavalry and endeavor to overtake the Forces of Tarquin and Tullia; for in stead of their Protector I am become their mortal Enemy, and at your return you shall know my intentions. Aronces answer'd Porfenna with as much respect as if he had not been injured by him; and obeying him at the same hour, he went forth with Artemidorus, Themistus, Mutius, Herminius, Theonor, and all the rest to summon the Troops together; and left Porfenna with Galerita, the Princess of the Luontines, Horfilia, Melintha, and the sage Soothsayer who confirm'd him in his good sentiments. But now all the Camp beholding Aronces at liberty and in the head of the Troops, testifi'd an inconceivable joy. The Prince wishing ardently to overtake Tarquin's Forces, made such diligence that though the distance were great, he came upon them in disorder, they having not gone very fast, because they were retarded by their baggage. Whereupon Aronces charging vigorously upon them, cut them in pieces, and put them into such disorder, that Tarquin and Tullia (fearing to fall into the power of Porfenna, and that he should deliver them up to the Romans) forsook their Forces, left Titus to command them, and fled away by unfrequented ways, and went to seek Sanctuary with the Tyrant of Cuma, where they were ill enough receiv'd, and in process of time dy'd very miserable, as well as the infamous Sextus. But the Prince Titus soon saw the rest of his Troops cut in pieces, and he was known by Aronces who could have slain him, if he would; but this generous Prince considering him as a Friend and a virtuous Prince, favour'd his retreat, which he made only with five others. And so seeing there were no more enemies to overcome, nor any hope of taking Tarquin or Tullia, Aronces return'd to the Camp; but upon the way he met Octavius in the head of two hundred Roman horse, who understanding that Tarquin was pursu'd, was going to help Aronces to overcome him. As soon as Aronces beheld him, he went civilly to him; and having in two words told him what had pass'd, he separated himself at some distance from all the rest, and addressing to him, conjur'd him to be still favourable to him, and to sweeten the mind of Clelia as much as he could. Whereby falling to speak of Clelia, as they were crossing a Wood they unawares left the great way in which the Troops march'd, and took a by-path which led them away from them. And out of respect there was none follow'd them but one of the Squires of Aronces. They had scarce gone a quarter of an hour, but Aronces thought he heard the voice of Horatius, and a noise of the clashing of swords. Whereupon hastning through the trees towards the place whence the voice came, he saw ten or twelve men dead whom his redoubtable Rival had slain, and saw him encompass'd by ten or twelve more who endeavor'd either to take or kill him. He had no more but the Truncheon of a sword in his hand, his Shield was broken, and he would have infallibly been taken if Aronces had not arriv'd. For as Horatius had seiz'd one of the mens swords to wrest it from him, another was going to thrust his through his body, when Aronces beholding him in this condition, resolv'd to rescue him. What a cry'd he as he advanc'd with his sword drawn towards those who attack'd Horatius are there still any Tarquinians, who dare attack a Roman, after Tarquin is defeated and overcome, and fled? And so the Prince, Octavius and his Squire made such a fierce charge upon those that were ready to destroy Horatius, that they chang'd their design of killing him into that of defending themselves. But Horatius knowing the voice of Aronces, seem'd more afflicted to see that he was once more his deliverer, than he had been daunted at the danger he was lately in. Nor was it long before he beheld Aronces kill one of his enemies, enemies, wound two, and sustain the effort of the rest. Whereupon taking new heart, he leapt to the ground to take a sword of one of the slain, and remounting his horse, set himself to defend Aronces; but there was no need; for having slain one, and Octavius wounded some others, the rest betook themselves to flight. After which Aronces civilly accosted his Rival whilst his Squire was redressing something about the bridle of his horse. You know (said he to him, preventing him from speaking) when I saw you last, I oblig'd you in the secret conversation we had together, to promise me that if I dy'd you would never force Clelia to marry you, that you would make use of nothing but entreaties; and if you could not move her, not to cease to protect her all your life against such as would constrain her. You promis'd this in consideration of the small service I had then done you; and I promis'd you again that I would never marry Clelia, till I had offer'd you to win her by a Combate with you. I acquit my self of my word (added Aronces) for though I am not certain whether I am likely to be happy, yet there have lately fallen out so many changes in my fortune, that I have some ground to hope it; wherefore before we go to the Camp, I will hide my self in the Wood we are to pass through, and satisfy you if you desire it. But, my Lord (answer'd Horatius) what would you say of me, if owing my life and liberty more than once to you, I should draw my sword against you the same moment that you have employ'd yours in my defence? I would say (reply'd Aronces) that a Rival is not so oblig'd to gratitude as other persons are. Ha! my Lord (cry'd Horatius hastily) I should not be satisfi'd of that, and therefore 'tis best that I yield a felicity to you which you alone can merit, and the Gods themselves have decreed to you; nor was I going but to seek my death in helping you to overcome Tarquin, when I met those that assaulted me. But to complete your happiness (added he) know, that as I beheld Clelia enter into Rome, she spoke so rigorously to me, that I am convinc'd nothing but death can comfort me. That which you say is so worthy of your courage (answer'd Aronces) that if you will be my friend, I shall with joy be yours as long as I live. Alas! my Lord (reply'd Horatius) I know not my own Will, but for fear my virtue abandon me, permit me to leave you and return to Rome. And accordingly Horatius departing from Aronces went to relate to the Romans the Victory of his Rival. Clelia in the mean time had been receiv'd there in triumph with all her companions. But Horatius (to carry his generosity further) went to Clelius and shew'd him the answer the Lots of Præneste had given him; for he had sent one of his Friends thither, who brought it him back, and which was so exact that nothing could be more clear; for it was in these terms. Clelius says Clelia to Aronces, the Gods decree so, and you cannot pretend to her without displeasing them. Aronces being by this time return'd to the Camp, was receiv'd with joy by Porfenna, Galeria, the Princess of the Leontines, all the Army and the whole Court. And (to accomplish his felicity) the King of Hetruria told him, that to testify to Rome that he desir'd to hasten the peace, he would discamp the next day, and send Ambassadors to demand Clelia of the Senate. Aronces thank'd with a joy surpassing all expression. And accordingly the King of Hetruria made good his word, discamping the day following, and sending to demand Clelia of the Senate for the Prince his Son, to the end the might be the confirmer of the peace. The Senate receiv'd this proposition with joy, and requir'd Clelia

of Clelius, who after he understood the truth of all things, deliver'd her to them with the consent of Horatius. Whereupon without further delay, the Princess of the Leontines went to fetch Sulpicia and Clelia to conduct them to Clusium where the ceremony was to be accomplish'd, and whither Clelia went too accompany'd by Octavius, Hermionus, Zenocrates, Anacreon and his particular Friends. As for Clelia, she was accompany'd by Berelisa and Clidamira who were return'd from Præneste, and Valeria: for Plotina was so afflicted for the death of Amilcar, that she fell sick upon it, and could not go thither. As soon as Porfenna and all this noble and fair company were arriv'd at Clusium, the Nuptials of Aronces and Clelia were celebrated in the the proud Temple of Juno the Queen with incredible magnificence. But to the astonishment of all the spectators, as Aronces and Clelia were upon their knees before that famous Statue of Juno, Porfenna plac'd his Scepter upon the Altar, as resigning his authority to the Gods from whom he held it; and Galerita put a Crown of Flowers upon Clelia's head, as declaring her Queen. After which the Priest taking the Scepter presented it to Aronces, who modestly refus'd it: Nor would he accept the Sovereign Power which Porfenna hereby resign'd to him. So that by this great action he made himself compleatly worthy of all the felicity he enjoy'd by the possession of the most virtuous person that ever was. In the midst of this publick joy, Amilcar had the honour to be much regretted; Anacreon made Verses upon this happy Marriage; and after eight intire days were spent in feasting and rejoycing, Themistius, Merigenes and their Friend went to seek Lindamira, Artemidorus return'd to Leontium to make Berelisa his Princess there, and to cause Lysimira to marry Zenocrates, who recover'd the Principality of Herbesa which had belong'd to his Ancestors. As for Clidamira, though she was assur'd to marry Meleontus, yet she was not so well contented as she seem'd; Theanor and Amilius obey'd the Gods, and were happy; the other Lover went to travel to cure himself of his passion. And as for Hermionus, at his return to Rome, Publicola gave him Valeria, notwithstanding all the obstacles which oppos'd his happiness. Hermilia had a great friendship for Octavius, and Octavius for her, but married not: Collatina dy'd with sorrow for the the misfortunes of Titus, and Plotina declar'd to all her Lovers that she would never marry. It was known that the Prince who persecuted Clorandus was dead; and Horatius as unhappy as he was, nevertheless was so generous as to take care to cause Clelia's Statue to be erected according to the Vote of the Senate in the upper part of the sacred street, near his own, having this sad consolation, to see that the tokens of their glory were at least in the same place. But in acknowledgment of his generosity, Aronces and Clelia sent to offer him their friendship, so that after so many misfortunes these two illustrious persons saw themselves as happy as they had been unfortunate, and saw nothing that could equal their felicity besides their virtue. Clelia had a Statue at Rome; Porfenna also caus'd one to be made for her before the stately Tomb which he had built, and Anacreon put these Verses upon the pedestal of the Statue.

Tyber, although a God, amazed stood
At that great Soul that durst attempt his flood,
And cry'd, This sure must some new Venus be,
Born from my waves as she was from the Sea.
Thy form and courage Fame alike shall blow,
Till Rome so stand, and Tyber cease to flow.
